made by the several States upon these subjects is left in full force, and these extraordinary statutes were enacted upon the assumption that it is the right and duty of the general government to take charge of, and to direct and control by its executive officers and its judicial tribunals, the execution and administration of the State laws, both as to registration and election. It is the first instance in the history of our legislation, so far as I am advised, in which the government of the United States has, in time of profound peace, usurped the entire authority of the several States over the subject of elections, or any other subject—the first instance in which it has forcibly wrested from the States an entire code of civil and penal law and placed its administration under the exclusive supervision of federal officers and federal courts. The whole State authority, not only over the election, but over the voter and over the elective franchise itself, is subverted. Every officer and citizen of the State, from its governor down to its constables, and from the judges of its highest court down to the inspectors and clerks who conduct the elections, is completely subordinated to the authority of the federal police provided for in these statutes. The fact that they are called supervisors and special deputy marshals of elections is immaterial; they are police nevertheless. It is not the name but the nature of the functions performed that must determine the character of the officer, and the chief duties, the most effective duties, performed by these officers who swarm around the places of registration and around the ballot-boxes, are constabulary in their nature. And, sir, no matter how degraded their characters may be, no matter how ignorant they may be of the plainest principles of law and justice, or how arbitrary and despotic in the exercise of their authority, their persons are sacred and their power is supreme under these laws over every functionary of the State from the highest to the lowest. They may command them all, not only to submit to their authority, but to aid them in compelling others to submit also. Armed with the imperial authority of the United States, every man is compelled to bow in humble submission to their demands, however insolent or illegal they may be; for no man can resist them by lawful means or otherwise while engaged in the discharge of their duties under these statutes. No State officer, although holding process regularly issued from a State court, can touch them, and no citizen can appeal to the tribunals of his own State for redress, civilly or criminally, on account of any outrage they may perpetrate under color or pretense of their official authority.

It is a fact worthy of notice, that although the election laws of the United States are full of provisions prescribing the most severe punishments for the officers and citizens of the States, not only for what they may actually do, but for what they may offer or attempt to do, no matter how free they may be from intentional wrong, there is not a single provision imposing even the slightest penalty upon these federal election officers for any outrage or crime they may commit; and yet every civil and criminal prosecution against them must go into the federal courts!

But, returning for a moment to the special duties prescribed for these officers, let us see whether or not they relate merely to elections for representatives. They are to inquire into and decide upon the qualifications of citizens who offer to register or to vote, but they do not confine their investigations merely to his qualifications to register or vote for representatives in Congress; they pass upon his right generally, and consequently if there are local State officers to be elected at the same time, as is nearly always the case, they exercise precisely the same power in respect to them as in respect to the representatives. If they prevent a citizen from registering, where registration is required by the State law, he can no more vote for local officers than for a member of this House. If, when he approaches the polls they arrest him and carry him away, before he has voted, as they were instructed to do, and did, in New York, he is deprived of his right of suffrage for local officers as completely as for representatives in Congress. It is evident, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that even if the general nature and purpose of these statutes were such as to bring them within the constitutional provision concerning the manner of holding elections for representatives, they are so framed as to make them necessarily unconstitutional in their practical operation and effect. For this reason alone, if there were no other, they ought to be repealed at once.

In order to enable these supervisors and special deputy marshals to accomplish this unwarranted interference with the local and municipal elections in the State, they are, as I have already stated, clothed with the power to override and suppress the authority of every state officer in the vicinity of the polls. They are to keep the peace and preserve order, which, of course, implies the authority to decide when the peace has been, or is about to be, broken, and when order has been, or is about to be, disturbed; but if they make arrests, as they are required to do, with or without warrant, for assaults and batteries or other breaches of the peace, they must carry the party before a United States commissioner, who has not a shadow of jurisdiction over the offense. In order to enable them to do this idle thing, to perform this farce, every state conservator of the peace is obliged, if called upon, to place himself under the control of these men.

Mr. Chairman, under the clause of the constitution from which it is claimed the authority to pass these laws is derived, Congress possesses precisely the same measure of power to make or alter regulations respecting the time and manner of holding elections for senators that it does to regulate the time and manner of holding elections for representatives. About this there is no room whatever for controversy. Whatever power is delegated as to the time and manner in the one case is necessarily delegated in the other, for exactly the same language applies to both. If, therefore, federal officers can be authorized and required to guard and scrutinize the process of electing a representative, to count the votes, and to arrest the citizen, or the inspector, judge, or clerk, while the election is progressing, and take him away from the voting place, so they may be authorized and required to guard and scrutinize the process of electing a senator by the State legislature, to count the votes in that body, and to arrest the members, or the presiding officer, or secretary before the election is commenced, or while it is going on, or after it is over, just as it may suit the will or caprice of the officer. Imagine, if you can, sir, a federal police force surrounding the chair of the presiding officer in the legislature of your State during the election of a United States senator, clothed by a federal law with absolute authority to arrest him without complaint or process and drag him instantly from his place whenever, in their opinion, his decisions and rulings are not in accordance with the laws. Imagine the same character of officials standing guard over the clerk or secretary while he calls the roll and records the votes of the people's representatives, with like authority to seize him in the midst of his duties and eject him from his place. Imagine them on the floor of the hall examining the credentials of members to ascertain whether they have a right to vote, scrutinizing their conduct and motives to see whether they have been bribed or intimidated, and arresting all who vote or attempt or offer to vote contrary to the law as interpreted by these subordinate executive officials. These are not by any means improbable scenes if such laws as these are constitutional. They may occur in every State in the Union if the precedent established by this legislation is not repudiated, for it is clear that those who will not respect the plainest rights of the people themselves will have no regard for the rights of their representatives. The right of the representative is no more sacred than the right of his constituent; in fact it is nothing but the right of the constituent represented in the person and official character of his elected servant. Every blow aimed at the freedom and independence of the individual citizen inflicts a wound upon the government under which he lives and brings shame and dishonor upon all who fail to resent it. The citizen is the source, the very fountain head, of political power in our system, and when he is not safe from the assaults of usurped authority his representative need not hope to escape.

Is there a gentleman upon this floor, is there an intelligent man within the limits of this broad land, who conscientiously believes that the framers of the constitution ever intended to confer upon Congress this monstrous power, a power to break up the Union by destroying the States of which it is composed? And yet, sir, that is what must be contended for by every gentleman who attempts to justify these laws under the provision of the constitution relating to the holding of elections for senators and representatives.

Let no gentleman, here or elsewhere, say that I am in favor of giving immunity to fraud, whether it be committed on the day when the votes are cast or on the day when the votes are counted. An honest count is as necessary as an honest vote. My doctrine is, and always has been, that every man in this country who is entitled by the constitution and laws of his State to the right of suffrage, no matter what may be his race, or his color, or his politics, or his religion, or his standing in the community, ought to be afforded a free and unobstructed pathway to the polls. But, sir, it is as great a crime to disfranchise the citizen after he has voted as it is to disfranchise him before. It is as great a crime fraudulently to reject his ballot after he has deposited it as it is to prevent him, by intimidation or otherwise, from putting it into the box in the first instance; [applause;] and whatever authority the government of the United States rightfully possesses to protect the rights of the citizen in these respects, I am willing shall be exercised, but I will never consent to go a step beyond the grant of power in the constitution even to accomplish what the majority may think is a good purpose.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, disclaiming any intention to make appeals to passion, disclaiming any purpose to excite partisan feeling or to further embitter the debate upon these very exciting questions, I say to the gentlemen upon the other side, not in any spirit of arrogance or dictation, but with all the deliberation and earnestness which the gravity of this great subject deserves, that these odious and oppressive statutes must be repealed, and this dangerous power of the Executive to control the election of the people's representatives must be taken away. [Applause.] These laws are unconstitutional, unnecessary, and in the highest degree offensive to the genius of our republican institutions. They were partisan in their origin and purpose, and have been administered in a spirit of intolerance and persecution. They must no longer stain and disfigure the pages of the statute-book. The contest which we are now waging against them will go on with increasing earnestness and determination until all the questions involved in it are finally settled. If they are not settled here, the struggle will pass from these halls into that great tribunal where the people themselves pronounce and execute judgment upon public men and public measures. It requires no gift of prophecy to predict what the end will be. With such questions as these to be discussed, and such a people as ours to decide them, there can, in my judgment, be but one result. The history of the great race to which we belong is an almost continuous record of heroic struggles against the exercise of arbitrary power and of splendid triumphs over the oppressors of the people, and its current cannot now be reversed by any human authority. In my judgment, no two institutions have contributed more to preserve the spirit of liberty, of order, and of self-government among the men of that race than the trial by jury and the elective franchise; and so long as they shall continue to exist in their usual strength and vigor the Anglo-Saxon will be a freeman.

Impartial juries and free elections—these, sir, are the words to be inscribed on every banner that leads the people in the coming contest. [Applause.] With unbounded confidence in the intelligence, patriotism, and courage of that great constituency which sent us here and which will choose our successors, I shall not hesitate to stand by my convictions in this matter until the end comes, whatever the end may be, nor shall I hesitate to take my share of the responsibility which belongs to those who have inaugurated this struggle for impartial trials by jury, for free elections, and for independent representation. [Great applause.]

Mr. McKINLEY obtained the floor.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman from Ohio will yield to me, I will move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. McKINLEY. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SUBPŒNA TO AN OFFICER OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 16, 1879.

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a subpœna addressed to Mr. Ferris Finch, file clerk of the House of Representatives, whose attendance is required on the 18th instant as a witness before the general court-martial in the case of Colonel D. S. Stanley, Twenty-second Infantry, with request that the subpœna may be delivered to Mr. Finch.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

The SPEAKER. The subpœna had better be read.

The Clerk read the subpœna, as follows:

Subpœna for witness to appear and testify before a general court-martial.

To Ferris Finch, Esq., file clerk of the House of Representatives, Washington, District of Columbia, greeting:

You are hereby commanded to appear as witness, on the 18th day of April, 1879, at eleven o'clock a. m., at Army Building, New York City, before the general court-martial appointed thereat by Special Orders No. 66, issued from headquarters of Army, Adjutant-General's Office, of date of March 20, 1879, to testify to certain matters before said court in the case of the United States against Colonel D. S. Stanley, Twenty-second Infantry, for the United States; and you are further commanded to bring with you and produce before the court manuscripts of the testimony given by Colonel W. B. Hazen, Sixth Infantry, before the Military Committee of the House of Representatives, in 1872; also answers of said Hazen to interrogations propounded to him at the same time by said committee (by the chairman thereof) both written and printed; and to then and there remain and abide the order of said court in the premises, pursuant to the statute in such cases made and provided. Of your appearance before said court, at the time and place stated in this summons, fail not, under penalty of the law.

Given under my hand this 14th day of April, A. D., 1879.

D. G. SWAIM,
Judge-Advocate, United States Army.

The SPEAKER. This is a subpœna to an officer of the House for his personal presence, and in addition it requires him to produce certain files of the House, and the Chair believes original papers now upon the files in the Clerk's office.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand from the reading of the subpœna that it calls for the original manuscript of the evidence given before one of the committees of this House. I do not know myself how far we are at liberty to give to courts and courts-martial the testimony of witnesses who may appear before committees of this House.

I understand that so far as the privileges of members are concerned they are not to be questioned elsewhere for what they say or do here, and I understand that witnesses who come before our committees are to be protected in coming here and going hence, and as to what may be brought out before a committee of the House by the rules of evidence.

I think, therefore, that this is a matter of very great importance, and that it had better be referred to the Committee on Rules that they may report what action the House will take in the premises.

A MEMBER. Say the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I will modify my motion so as to refer the matter to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The committee had better be directed to report immediately.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will move, then, that they have leave to report at any time. My motion is that these papers be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report at the earliest time possible what action the House shall take in the premises.

The motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. WHITEAKER, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House the papers relating to the Klamath Indian reservation; there being no adverse report thereon.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSTON, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Sallie Hardeman; there being no adverse report thereon.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated;

By Mr. ACKLEN: The petition of Joseph H. Acklen, (accompanied by draught of bill,) for the regulation of the tariff on sugar—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. ELLIS: The petition of the members of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia, (accompanied by bill,) that they be paid the 20 per cent. additional compensation given to Government employés by the act approved February 28, 1867—to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. FERDON: The petition of James H. Reeve, for an increase of pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GILLETTE: The petition of Edward H. Gillette, (accompanied by draught of bill,) that a pension be granted William E. Prince—to the same committee.

By Mr. HUNTON: The petition of James B. Burdett, administrator of Janus Broadus, that a bill in the form therein set forth may be passed for the payment of a revolutionary claim—to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSTON: Papers relating to the claim of W. B. Isaacs & Co., of Richmond, Virginia—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. KNOTT. The petition of certain seamen, officers, and shippers, of vessels destroyed by the Alabama, Florida, and Shenandoah, in their own behalf and of others; of owners, masters, officers, and crew of the bark Harvest; and of the owners and proprietors of the Dispatch line of packet-ships between New York and China, for indemnity for losses sustained by the attacks upon their vessels by the Alabama and other rebel cruisers during the late war, and the payment thereof out of the balance of the Geneva award—to the same committee.

Also, the petition of Margaret G. Meade, administratrix of the estate of Richard W. Meade, deceased, that she be paid an amount adjudicated by the Spanish government to be due said decedent, the payment of which amount was subsequently assumed by the United States, and for the passage of a bill as therein set forth—to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. LINDSEY: The petition of Carlos Butterfield, (accompanied by draught of bill,) that the Secretary of State be required to deliver to him certified copies of all papers and accounts filed in the State Department by the late joint commission, being proofs of indebtedness of Mexico to the late firm of Carlos Butterfield & Co.—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, the petition of Carlos Butterfield, (accompanied by draught of joint resolution,) that the Secretary of State be required to furnish information to Congress in reference to the claim of Carlos Butterfield against the government of Denmark—to the same committee.

Also, the petition of Greenleaf Cilley, commander in the United States Navy, to be restored to the active list—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. NEWBERRY: The petition of 80 citizens and business firms of Detroit, Michigan, for authority to construct a bridge across Detroit River, at Detroit—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. PRESCOTT: The petition of Dr. Mary E. Walker, for an increase of pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ROBERTSON: A paper relating to the establishment of a post-route from Palestine, Louisiana, to Conerly, Mississippi—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania: The petition of Jacob and Elizabeth Sener to be refunded tax and penalty unjustly assessed and collected from them—to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio: The petition of Corning & Co. and 17 other firms, of Cleveland, Ohio, for the amendment of the revenue laws—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. WISE: The petition of Morgan R. Wise, (accompanied by draught of bill,) that a pension be granted Mary A. Casterweller—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FERNANDO WOOD: The petition of Adam Roediger, for an inquiry into the sale of the steamer Josie and the disposition of the proceeds, which steamer was seized and sold by United States revenue officials—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WRIGHT: The petition of J. C. G. Kennedy, of Washington, District of Columbia, relating to the United States census—to the Committee on the Census.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 18, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of Matthew O'Regan, late of Company E, Third United States Artillery, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Margaret Cahill, widow of James Cahill, late a captain in the Second United States Cavalry, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 445) for the relief of Joseph B. Campbell; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McDONALD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 446) granting a pension to Jefferson Kinder; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McMILLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 447) to authorize the Southern Minnesota Railway Extension Company to lay out and construct and operate a railroad from the western boundary-line of Minnesota to the Missouri River; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 448) for the relief of the Fifth Baptist Church (colored) of Washington, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Select Committee on the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company.

APPOINTMENT AND REMOVAL OF SENATE EMPLOYÉS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no "concurrent or other resolutions," the first business in order is the resolution offered yesterday by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE,] which will be reported.

The Secretary read the following resolution submitted by Mr. WALLACE April 17:

Resolved, That the standing order of the Senate regulating the appointment and removal of clerks and other employés of the Senate be, and it is hereby, amended by striking out of the same all after the word "respectively," in the third line, so that the same shall read as follows:

"Resolved, That the several officers and others in the departments of the Secretary of the Senate and of the Sergeant-at-Arms shall be appointed and removed from office by those officers respectively."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I see by the printed Calendar of resolutions that a resolution offered by myself on the 19th of March respecting going into general legislation stands first in order, and then the "resolution by Mr. HOAR, relating to the effects of certain proposed legislation." I had the impression myself, I am bound to say in the candor which should and does characterize all that we say, that both those resolutions had been laid upon the table by a vote of the Senate. If so, I suppose that is an order of the Senate which takes them off the Calendar of everything entirely. I ask the Chair if I am right about that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood day before yesterday, on inquiring of the clerks whether there were any resolutions on the Calendar which had to be called up at the expiration of the morning business, that there were only two resolutions, and they had both been laid upon the table on a vote by yeas and nays. The Chair supposed then, and so stated to the Senate, that they were not resolutions to be submitted to the Senate at the expiration of the morning business, but could only be taken up on a motion to take them from the table. Yesterday there was the same announcement, and no objection was made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the Chair is entirely correct. I only called attention to it because on the printed Calendar these resolutions appear to stand at the head. If they did, I wanted them acted upon; but I have no doubt the statement of the Chair is perfectly correct. With that understanding I hope the Calendar, when next printed, will have those resolutions left off. The Senate have refused to consider those two resolutions, and I want it so understood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have it reported again. My attention was diverted.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the order read which the resolution proposes to repeal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be read.

Mr. WALLACE. It is at page 160 of the Manual.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the several officers and others in the departments of the Secretary of the Senate and of the Sergeant-at-Arms shall be appointed and removed from office by those officers respectively as heretofore; but when made during the session of the Senate, any such removal to be first approved by the President of the Senate on reasons to be assigned therefor by the officer making the removal; and when in the recess, such reasons, in writing, to be laid before the President of the Senate on the first day of the succeeding session, and to be approved or disapproved by him.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, we all understand that the passage of this resolution has been determined by a power higher than the Senate, for there is in the Senate a power greater than the Senate itself, an imperium in imperio which governs by its own mere motion.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Let me ask the Senator how he understands that? He says that "we all understand." I should like to know how he understands it?

Mr. ANTHONY. We understand it from the declarations that have been made on the other side, that measures would be introduced into this body by the committee appointed by the democratic caucus.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am afraid the Senator from Rhode Island has a very fertile imagination.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator deceives himself. He can hear sounds in the air which nobody else can hear. I assure the Senator that so far as his statement is concerned he is wholly incorrect. If he means to say that there has been a caucus determination upon this question, I know as a democratic Senator that the gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. ANTHONY. I judge from the declarations made the other day upon the other side of the Chamber; for when the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] made a speech, an admirable and I conceive it an unanswerable one, upon the revolutionary tendency of forcing legislation upon appropriation bills as a condition of voting the money to support the Government and to carry into effect existing legislation, he was rebuked for introducing the discussion of a subject in the absence of the Senator who had it in charge; and when my friend from New York [Mr. CONKLING] naturally enough asked how a Senator, other than he who introduced it, could be said to be in charge of a measure that had not been reported or even referred to a committee of this body, the reply was that it was in charge of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] then absent, and who now graces the chair, the chairman of a committee appointed by the democratic caucus; that he was pondering upon the legislation that was proper to be introduced into this body; that he was considering what measures we should act upon; and that when in his good pleasure he should report them they would be acted upon, and would so commend themselves to Congress that they would pass. Why would they pass? Because they would have been agreed upon in the democratic caucus; and so improper was the discussion considered in the absence of the chairman of the executive committee of the democratic caucus, that a motion was made to lay the measure on the table, pending which the Senate, by a party vote, adjourned, effecting the same object that would have been accomplished if the motion to lay upon the table had prevailed, cutting off debate.

And when a few days later, fully recognizing the law laid down upon the other side, that it was improper to take up any measure which had not been passed upon by the democratic caucus, I innocently suggested that if the chairman of that august body, superior to the Senate, had nothing to offer, had no commands to lay before us, we should proceed to the consideration of executive business, the very mention of the word "caucus," although coupled with a full admission of the authority claimed for it on the other side, so grieved and offended the feelings of our democratic brethren that they found themselves unfitted for the transaction of public business, and sought relief for their wounded sensibilities in a hasty and indignant adjournment.

Mr. President, I should be chargeable with an uncommon degree of vanity if I supposed that any argument I might advance, that any fact I could adduce, would be more than the fly upon the wheel of this car of Juggernaut which rolls through the Senate, crushing out our venerable precedents, trampling upon our ancient usages, and breaking in upon the freedom of our discussions; but I will venture to reproduce some sentiments which cannot be denied, though they may be repudiated, sentiments spoken by one of the most distinguished of the ancient leaders upon the other side of the Chamber, a man who long held a conspicuous position in this body, the position that now is so ably filled by my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON,] and who is able to fill any position in this body—chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. This will show what was democratic doctrine in 1854, twenty-five years ago, and may serve to mark the progress that has been made from that time to this in the great measures of reform. The wholesome rule which this resolution proposes to abrogate was adopted at the first session of the Thirty-third Congress on the report of a committee, of which James M. Mason, of Virginia, was chairman. In the report he says:

The committee concur entirely in the recommendation of the Sergeant-at-Arms that the officers in the employ of the Senate should be permanent.

The Senate is a permanent body, liable to be convoked separately from its coordinate branch, and should be always in a state of efficient organization. The only sound objection to such organization would be on the score of expense; and under that recommended by the committee it will be found that this is materially diminished.

* * * * * * *

In the opinion of the committee the correct and safe transaction of the business of the Senate is materially dependent on retaining in its service a corps of experienced well trained, and diligent officers; and this can only be done by security in their respective positions so long as they continue faithful in the discharge of their duties.

While, therefore, they recommend, as in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, that the appointment of his subordinates and the power of dismissal should remain with those officers respectively, who must be responsible for all the service committed to their charge, yet they further recommend that their subordinate officers, during the sessions of the Senate, shall be dismissed only by the Secretary of the Senate and the Sergeant-at-Arms, respectively, for reasons to be stated in writing, and such dismissal to be approved by the President of the Senate; in the recess of the Senate such dismissal, with the reasons therefor, to be reported to the President of the Senate in writing on the first day of the next meeting of the Senate thereafter, and then in like manner to be subject to his approval.—Senate Reports, Thirty-third Congress, first session, Report No. 344.

And in the debate which ensued the same Senator spoke as follows—a motion being made by Mr. Bright to strike out the part of the resolution which made the appointment of those officers subject to the approval of the Vice-President—

Senators who have read the report will find—that the object of the committee was, and they thought it was in accordance with the judgment of the Senate, to make the organization of the Senate permanent, to have an efficient body of officers to assist them in the discharge of their public duties, and to remove from the Senate every inducement or desire to keep its organization unsettled by the introduction of new officers from session to session, or from Congress to Congress.

We know, sir, that the practice of the Government, in its various Departments, has been, upon a new accession to power, to change all the subordinates, all the ministerial officers, not because they have been inefficient men, but solely and simply to put in others who wanted the places. It is to prevent the introduction of that practice into the Senate that the committee have recommended the permanent character of the organization.

Sir, no Senator who has been in the discharge of his duties here long enough to know the practice of the Senate, and what is required of Senators, can fail to be impressed with the exceeding importance to him, in the discharge of his duties, and to the public who are to be benefited by that discharge, of having a competent body of officers in the Senate, men who are trained and educated in the Senate, who know where to find what you want, how to give you information when you want it, and where to direct you to it. It is highly important to all the Senators, and more especially to Senators when they come here for the first time. The fear was, that unless the power of removal was in some way restrained, the officer having the power of appointment might at times feel himself coerced to remove some of the employés in his department to put in others who wanted the places, and who, ninety-nine times in a hundred, would be incompetent in the discharge of their duties.

Mr. Mason goes on to say, in reply to the proposition of Mr. Bright:

There may be reasons in favor of that proposition, but in my judgment, at least, the reasons against it are insuperable. These offices are valuable offices, not in emolument only but in dignity. But they are valuable also in emolument in the eyes of office-seekers; and if the Senate determine to go into an election of these officers at each Congress, the effect of it will be that those outside who are seeking office will consider it a proclamation for proposal, and they will come here and besiege the door of the Senate Chamber—besiege the door of the Senate Chamber from all quarters, and their respective friends, to turn out the existing officers. Now, sir, I will not repeat what I said before as to the great importance to the Senate of preserving an efficient organization. But what will be the efficiency if the principal officers, those who are responsible for the execution of the duties of all, are changed from time to time? I hope it will not be done.—Congressional Globe, volume 28, part 3, first session Thirty-third Congress, (1854,) page 1768.

Mr. President, I will not supplement these just and conservative remarks by any observations of my own; if they had any effect it would be to weaken the force of them, if they retain any force under this new régime of reform; but I will only say that whomsoever the exigencies of party may bring to fill the places now occupied by faithful, diligent, courteous, trained and experienced officials they will find the house "swept and garnished." They will find the files of the Senate arranged, classified, accessible—to those who know how to look for them. They will find in the basement of this vast edifice forty thousand volumes, mainly the surplus accumulations of a Government of nearly a hundred years, so arranged that any one who knows where they are placed (and there are men here who do) can go down into a room, in the dark, and pick out a designated volume. They will find a methodical, orderly, economical, and honest administration of the affairs of the Senate. Whether the new and untried and inexperienced men who shall succeed them will be able to contribute as much to our comfort and convenience and to the dispatch of the public business experience will show.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, I suppose there is no man in the Senate who has greater personal regard for the Senator from Rhode Island than I have; but I must confess, being a young man here as I am, that it surprises me very much to hear just such a speech from that Senator as he has made this morning, and as he made once before. That Senator has read to us what he is pleased to term a very conservative record upon the subject of the permanency of the officers and employés of the Senate in 1854. They are very good sentiments; but I suppose about 1861, if you examine the records you will find that the Senator from Rhode Island joined in turning out permanent officers, officers who had been in this body for years, and who would have been retained if the sentiments he has read to us had been observed.

I suppose in 1854 the persons who then had control of the Senate had the employés of the Senate, and they were very much in favor of making them permanent. I suppose in 1861 the Senator from Rhode Island was of a different opinion. I suppose that Senator will not dispute the fact that he joined in turning out the officers of the Senate in 1861. There is a sudden change which has come over the spirit of his dream. I suppose that even since the meeting of the Senate there have been changes on each side of the Chamber upon that subject as to partial permanency, because whereas this side of the Chamber was not in favor of universal permanency at the opening of this session, I suppose now even this side would be in favor of partial permanency. I suppose there are officers now in the office of the Secretary of the Senate and the Sergeant-at-Arms, and others, that we on our side would agree should stay there. I expect gentlemen on the other side would not agree to have them and would be opposed to permanency at once. I suppose, to tell the truth, if by some extraordinary occurrence the political complexion of the Senate should change to-morrow and our republican friends on the other side should be in a majority, they would be in favor of changing the officers again.

Now, why discuss this question? Why make these issues? Does not everybody know that, whether fortunate or unfortunate, wise or unwise, all parties are guilty, if it be guilt, of desiring ministerial officers in accord with the dominant party. Is there anything unusual about it? Is there anything criminal about it? Has not every member on the other side done that thing? Has not the venerable Senator from Rhode Island voted that way? Is not that his record? When the Senate changes from republican to democratic, why is it that the republicans all at once are seized with a wonderful desire to make the officers permanent and object to change? If it is changed from democratic to republican again, why will the democrats be seized with a desire to make the officers permanent and object to a change? With all due deference to the venerable Senator, it does strike me as childish. The Senator may take the record of 1861, when the complexion of this body was changed, and I will venture to say that more changes were made then in the officers and employés of the Senate than will be made by this body when all the changes shall be made that are designed. I challenge the Senator to the record on that subject when these changes are all over. I venture that the democrats in this body will remove fewer of the officers of this Senate than were removed by the republican party when it came into power.

Then, again, I had hoped the Senator had exhausted himself on caucus action the other day when he said if there was no business from the caucus, or a subcommittee of the caucus, or something of that sort, he would move that the Senate go into executive session. Does not that Senator know that the impression he is seeking to make on the country, that this body is governed by caucus action, is not correct? Has this body proposed any action whatever that lessens the free agency of the Senator from Rhode Island or anybody else here? Have we adopted any measure that bills and resolutions shall not be introduced by that Senator on any subject he pleases, that they shall not be introduced by anybody who pleases to introduce them? Is there anything that prevents any gentleman on this floor from introducing any bill or resolution that he sees proper under the rules? Has any motion been made anywhere that bills or resolutions should not be referred to a committee and should not be passed upon by a committee and reported from a committee, and when reported freely debated and discussed? Are we not discussing measures of that kind every day? You can propose as many amendments as you please. Why, then, seek to make the impression that a caucus has taken control of this body?

Now, I will say to that Senator another thing on which I am perfectly willing to go to the country, that the democratic party as far as I know its action—and I believe I am informed upon that subject—has never yet in caucus or out of caucus passed any rule or order or resolution that any member even of the democratic party shall be bound in his place by anything the caucus has done. I suppose the democratic members, as the republican members have done a thousand times, meet in caucus and confer for the purpose of having concert of action. That party does it every day; that party has done it during this session; that party has done it to a very memorable extent during the last ten or twelve years. All parties do that. And I suppose if you look into the history of this country you will find that the republican party have matured a great many measures in caucus to be introduced in this House and in the other House, and a great many bills and resolutions have come into the Senate after having been agreed upon by the party in caucus. I do not know whether the republican party did it in caucus or not, but I will say to the Senator that so far from the democratic party ever having passed any order or resolution that any member on that side of the Senate either in whole or in part should be bound by its caucus action, they have never done anything that binds even a single member of the democratic party in his official action in this body and in the other House.

I think we might as well meet these things as grown men ought to meet them. I suppose from the foundation of this Government, or from the division of the country into parties, all parties have had their caucuses, have conferred together as to what was the best policy to pursue in their judgment; I suppose that thing has been done just as long as parties have existed in this country. I do not see anything criminal in it; I do not see anything wrong in it. I expect I am as good a civil-service reformer as anybody ought to be. I do not see any harm in a party that is responsible for the legislation of the country having concert of action and adopting means for concert, as I say all parties have done; and I think if we go on with the business of the country without making these unnecessary issues the country will certainly not be damaged, and I think it will be benefited. I say this with the greatest kindness, for I have great respect for the Senator from Rhode Island. He is a man that I do esteem very much; and when a venerable Senator like that Senator, who has been here so long and understands so well what has occurred in this body, who has seen so many changes, and who has seen every party change the officers when it attained power, when he has himself helped to make such changes, when he has never failed to help to make such changes, I dare say, it is strange that one so distinguished, that one who should be an example to us all, should attempt to make issues of this kind which are unjust.

One of the most remarkable things that has ever occurred to me is this: whenever the democratic party attempt to do anything in this world now that the republican party have happened to do, they charge us with revolution at once; and if we do the very things which the republican party has done, if we adopt their methods in any respect, it seems to excite, it seems to alarm them. My friend says we are putting general legislation on appropriation bills. A great deal has been said upon that subject. That, it is said, is revolutionary; and yet the records show that the republican party has done that three hundred or four hundred times in a few years, and it never was revolutionary before!

He says we are holding democratic caucuses and we are maturing measures in the democratic caucus and agree upon measures to be pursued by the democratic caucus. Did the republicans never do the same thing? No party in this country ever did it more, or did it more rigidly, than the republican party; yet the very moment we are supposed to do anything that they have been doing, they raise the cry of revolution!

Now I respectfully and kindly say to the Senate, let us be done with this sort of childish business and go on with the business of the country.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, "the venerable Senator from Rhode Island" receives with all proper submission and humility the lecture delivered to him by his youthful friend from Georgia. The subject of caucus was not introduced in this Chamber by me; it was introduced on the other side, when it was assigned, as the reason for not considering a bill, that it was under deliberation by a committee of the democratic caucus. I am not responsible for the introduction of it here.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Now I ask the Senator did he, because the Senator from Kentucky or some other Senator said that a certain matter was under consideration by the democratic caucus, understand the Senator to mean that that democratic caucus was going to control the legislation, so that the free agency of this body would be disturbed, so that the right of introducing bills and referring bills and reporting upon bills by committees should be in the least changed, in the slightest degree lessened? Did he so regard it?

Mr. ANTHONY. I regarded him as meaning just what he said, that it was improper to discuss the question, in the absence of the chairman of the committee who had charge of it, according to the democratic caucus; and if it was improper to discuss it, of course it was improper to act upon it.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I did not understand the Senator from Kentucky as saying it was improper to discuss anything in the absence of the chairman of the democratic caucus committee, and I say to my friend—if "venerable" offends him I will say my youthful friend——

Mr. ANTHONY. No; I take it as a compliment.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I understood my friend from Kentucky to say no such thing; but I did understand him to say this, that the reply by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to a speech made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] in the absence of that Senator and when that Senator was detained at home sick, he did not think was proper; and that so far as the action of the caucus was concerned, I did understand the Senator from Kentucky to say that as the measure would be brought in in proper form before this body at an early day, he thought it proper to postpone discussion until the measure in a matured form was brought before the body. That was the substance of what he said.

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, I will give the exact words of what he said. The Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] had asked—

Will the Senator allow me to understand him? To what committee does he refer as one of which the Senator from Ohio is chairman?

Then, what followed?

Mr. BECK. A democratic committee now considering how it is best for this side of the House who have the responsibility to act to determine how we can best present the measures fairly and properly.

Mr. CONKLING. Not a committee of the Senate?

Mr. BECK. No, sir; not a committee of the Senate as such.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BECK. But a committee that I believe will present legislation that Congress and the country will approve and indorse; when that committee does act and those bills are up for consideration—

Not to be up for consideration until that committee had acted—then we will discuss all these questions to the satisfaction of gentlemen on the other side, we hope.

Again he said:

Therefore, as this resolution and speech has been, as I think, flung in improperly, in the absence of the gentleman who we recognize as having more to do with the preparation of the bills than anybody else—I mean the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN]—and as his former speech has been attacked behind his back, I move that the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts be laid on the table.

Being appealed to to withdraw it, he said:

I decline to withdraw it. The question has been argued in the absence of the gentleman mainly in charge, and I object.

Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia referred to the advent of the republican party into power, in this Chamber, in 1861. We changed then, I think, a single officer, the Sergeant-at-Arms. The Senate and the country were in a peculiar situation. The treason that had long been hatching in the South, in this city, and in this Chamber, had burst into open rebellion, into flagrant war. The seats upon that side of the Chamber were mainly vacant, vacated by men who had deserted them, to go into rebellion against the Government which they had sworn to support.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Will my friend, the Senator from Rhode Island, allow me one question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I have very few remarks to make, and I will listen to the Senator after I finish.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island declines to be interrupted.

Mr. ANTHONY. It was necessary that the elective officers of the Senate should be in sympathy with the party which sustained the Union and the Constitution. The elective officers have access to our executive and to our secret legislative sessions; they are familiar with all our proceedings; they are necessarily the depositaries of our secrets, and they know, to some extent, the foreshadowed action of the body. It was not deemed prudent that any man whose fidelity to the Union and Constitution was not above suspicion or equivocation, should be admitted into the secret sessions of the Senate, and for that reason the change was made.

The venerable Secretary of the Senate, who was a democrat and had been for more than twenty years in office, was retained, retained until he became incapacitated, by sickness and old age, from performing the duties of his office. Mr. McDonald, who had been in the service of the Senate twenty-two years, was a democrat, and was retained and promoted. Mr. Bassett, who had been here more than twenty years, was retained and promoted; and of the subordinate employés there were very few removals made. There were many vacancies; because many of the officers followed their patrons, who abandoned their seats and went into the South carrying their sympathies, if not their swords, to the aid of the rebellion, and their places of course were filled by men of our own political persuasion.

I have a list, somewhere, of the number of officers that were retained; it is very large, and they were retained for a long time, and very few changes were made. None, probably, would have been made from political considerations. They were made from loyal considerations.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. If the Senate should become republican in 1881, two years from now, will he oppose a change of the officers then?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will answer that when the time comes; and I hope to see it. I cannot tell whether another rebellion may not break out in the South. There seem to be signs of it now.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. If a rebellion does not break out, how then? Will you move to change them or not? Suppose we do not rebel?

Mr. ANTHONY. It will depend upon the manner in which they fulfill the duties of their offices. I do not think I shall ever be found advocating the removal of officers of this body who have performed their duties with fidelity, with honesty, and with intelligence.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Will you not conclude that a republican only can perform the duties in that way when you get into power?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I move to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved" and inserting what I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words proposed to be inserted will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

That, in the opinion of the Senate, the correct and safe transaction of the business of the Senate is materially dependent on retaining in its service a corps of experienced, well-trained, and diligent officers, and this can only be done by security in their respective positions so long as they continue faithful in the discharge of their duties.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will merely say that that is verbatim, except that I have inserted the word "Senate" in place of "committee," the report of the democratic committee of 1854 which I believe was unanimously acquiesced in and agreed to by men of all parties in this Chamber at that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. CONKLING and Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Is that offered as a substitute for the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is it exactly.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Not as an amendment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. An amendment to strike out all after "resolved" and insert this.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall not vote for that amendment. I view it rather as an assumption on the part of members on the other side that the majority of the Senate are not capable of appointing proper employés for the Senate to enable us to transact the public business. I think we are fully competent to manage the affairs of the Senate and retain such officers as in our judgment it is proper to retain and to remove such as in the opinion of those who are charged with the management of the public business in this Chamber should be removed.

I have nothing to say against the employés of the Senate, those that have been placed in power by our republican friends. Their bearing toward me has been courteous and kind, and I have nothing therefore to say against any of them; but I take it upon myself to say that we can select from our own ranks gentlemen equally as competent, equally as faithful in the performance of these duties, and I do not know any good rule or reason why we should not at least divide something of the patronage of the Senate with our own friends. I have never complained of the republican side of this Chamber for filling all the places in the employment of the Senate with their own friends.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to go on; but I will yield if the gentleman desires especially to interrupt me.

Mr. ANTHONY. I merely wish to say that when the Senator says the republicans filled all the offices of the Senate with their own political friends he is mistaken, for about one-quarter of the employés of the Senate were democrats.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not know what may have been the experience of other democratic Senators; but I have had the honor of a seat on this floor for more than eight years, and there is not a single employé in the Government, not only in the Senate, but there is not a single employé in the whole Government service that owes his position to any influence that I have exerted. One of the daughters of a late admiral of the Navy to whom I gave a letter to the Public Printer when I had the honor to be a member of the Committee on Printing under the chairmanship of the Senator from Rhode Island, an old lady, destitute and impoverished, went to the Government Printer and secured a position worth $20 a month. But with that exception there is not an employé under this Government that owes his or her appointment to any influence I have exerted, so far as I know. I have on one or two occasions attempted to secure for a person in very indigent circumstances employment in some of the Government Departments, but never with success. I have applied myself personally once or twice to the late Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, and I have never been favored with any employé except, I believe, on one occasion a young man was put in the folding-room to fold speeches during a press of business, at a dollar and a half a day, and who was retained perhaps for two or three weeks. And yet, after such exclusion of democratic Senators from participation in the patronage of the Senate, and the patronage of the Government, I think it ill becomes gentlemen on the other side to complain that we now propose to divide properly and fairly the patronage of this body by giving part of it to our own political friends.

Why, sir, that is a new-born virtue in the republican party which would deal impartially with men who are opposed to them politically. I have in my hand now a copy of a circular issued in Massachusetts which betrays something of the animus that has governed that party in the distribution of its patronage. Employés have been discharged or compelled to vote in conformity with the political wishes of republican employers. I hold in my hand a copy of a circular issued last year in Massachusetts, which I will read, addressed to an employer of men:

DEAR SIR: Your co-operation with the Massachusetts republican State central committee is most earnestly requested. It is in your power, by the authority you can exercise over those employed by you, to maintain the honor of Massachusetts and keep it out of the hands of spoilers and political knaves who have selected General Butler as their candidate. His election would disgrace our State and ruin our standing at home and abroad. A thorough canvass of those you employ and an early report to the secretary of the republican State central committee will be thankfully received.

That circular discloses the animus of the republican party in Massachusetts at least. They wanted employers to bring their power to bear on their employés——

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator be kind enough to yield a moment?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I prefer going on with my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Delaware yield?

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator decline to yield?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to say for one that I have no disposition to see a slaughter of the innocents; but at the same time as a democrat I should be untrue to my own feelings, I believe I should be untrue to the party that placed me as a Senator on this floor, if I should prefer my enemies to my friends. I do not do it, and I think there are places within the employment of this Senate that should be given to our democratic friends, and for one I shall advocate that policy, notwithstanding it meets with reprehension from gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I am surprised that the Senator from Delaware forgot his usual courtesy when reading a document which purported to come from Massachusetts that he declined to let a Massachusetts Senator arrest him. The document which he read and which he said emanated from the republican State central committee of Massachusetts is a forgery; it was pronounced by the State central committee of Massachusetts the day it appeared in print as a forgery; it was known to be a forgery by the man who sent it to the committee, from whose documents the Senator read, obtained by him, got up by him (as there is no doubt from the evidence) in the city of New York, and brought to Massachusetts to be used just in the way that the Senator from Delaware has been induced to use it this morning. It appeared in print in Massachusetts in the afternoon of the day before the election. The State central committee of Massachusetts pronounced it a forgery, and offered a reward for any particle of evidence that it ever was issued by them, or the appearance of any person in Massachusetts who had ever received a copy of it. That was all known in Massachusetts months before that paper was sent here to Washington, and has been incorporated into the files of one of our committees, and has been imposed upon the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. CONKLING. On what page of the document is this?

Mr. DAWES. It heads the first of the "papers laid before the committee, printed by order of the Senate made March 27, 1879." It stands at the head. I suppose, therefore, it is considered by the committee the most authentic piece of information they have in this whole document. The parties who got it up in Massachusetts abandoned it in less than twenty-four hours after they had put it forth, and there never could be found in Massachusetts, although a reward has been offered for him, the man who ever saw it or who brought it. It came into Massachusetts and was carried upon the platform of a public meeting in Massachusetts with the assurance that somebody had brought it from a printing-office in New York; but the man who brought it from the printing-office could not be found. No reward, no search-warrant has been able to this day to produce him. I am sorry the Senator from Delaware has been so imposed on.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Does the Senator from Massachusetts deny that the following letter was written by the chairman of the republican State committee?

Dear sir——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has the Senator from Massachusetts concluded his remarks?

Mr. DAWES. No, sir. Mr. President, it is no answer to this undertaking to put upon the public this forged document to ask me whether some other document is authentic or not. I am dealing with this one that stands at the head, and I not only pronounce it a forgery, but an acknowledged forgery in Massachusetts, and it must have been known to be such, if it was sent here from Massachusetts by anybody who has common intelligence in that State. If the committee who put it upon their records sent out to Massachusetts and themselves got it, they may take the responsibility themselves for it; but if any man in Massachusetts of ordinary intelligence sent it here, who reads the newspapers and is able to read the newspapers, he sent it here knowing that it was a forgery.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator from Massachusetts be kind enough to tell me whether the following letter dated—

REPUBLICAN STATE COMMITTEE OF MASSACHUSETTS,
HEADQUARTERS, 376 WASHINGTON STREET,
Boston, September 26, 1878.

(Adin Thayer, chairman; S. B. Stebbins, treasurer; George G. Crocker, secretary.)

DEAR SIR: In order to enable us to distribute documents effectively, will you kindly furnish us immediately with a list of the male members of your church and parish, and with such other names as you may deem expedient. By so doing you will aid us in saving the honor of our Commonwealth.

With esteem, yours,

ADIN THAYER, Chairman.

GEORGE G. CROCKER, Secretary— was not distributed to clergymen, and whether they did not invoke the aid of the church as well as the aid of the employers of men to assist in carrying out the republican schemes in Massachusetts?

Mr. DAWES. The Senator is quite willing to interrupt me after having declined to yield to me to correct a statement of his. Before I reply I first want to have a perfect understanding with the Senator from Delaware, and I want to know if he has anything further to say about this forgery before I pass to the other thing—the forgery which he read and which he declined to permit me to interrupt him to correct him on. I wish to know if he has anything further to say. Will he tell us how he came by it? Will he tell us who is the author of it? Will he tell us from what responsible source in Massachusetts it came here to be entered in the public records? Perhaps the Senator can tell us that which we have been unable to ascertain in Massachusetts, who did commit the forgery? The Senator is the first responsible gentleman I have seen yet who has undertaken to palm it off upon the public. Now, that I have found a responsible man, I should like very much to have him give us some information about the authorship of this paper. I think he is a responsible indorser to this paper; and according to the law-merchants the indorser cannot deny the genuineness of the signature, and I hold him responsible. I will answer his question about this other letter when he answers my question about the first one.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It is said to be common in the region of country from which the Senator comes, when a question is propounded, to answer it by asking another. The Senator said the first letter which I read was a forgery. Then when I asked whether the second was not addressed to the clergymen it purported to be sent to, he propounded another question to me in reply. I desire to elicit a specific response to the inquiry which I made.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator is mistaken in the order of things. The Senator had a question propounded to him and he tries to escape by putting another to me, and now he thinks I ought to answer that before he answers mine. If the Senator will confess that somebody has palmed off this forgery upon him, I will let him off. I have not the slightest objection to answering his question about the other letter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Several SENATORS. Regular order.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask that the resolution offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania and the substitute of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be entered.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. MCDONALD. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us try it on a division first.

Mr. WITHERS. Very well. It is not a debatable proposition, I know.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 20, noes 31.

RULE AS TO INTERRUPTIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before proceeding to the order of the day, the Chair begs leave of the Senate to be permitted to read Rule 38, a failure to observe the last part of which sometimes gives rise to disagreeable colloquies in the Senate:

38. The presiding officer shall name the Senator who is to speak, and in all cases the Senator who shall first rise and address the Chair shall speak first. No Senator shall speak to or interrupt another Senator in debate without his consent; and to obtain such consent he shall first address the Chair.

The Chair will feel it his duty to enforce that rule, the non-observance of which sometimes gives rise to very disagreeable colloquies.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And I am sure every Senator will thank the Chair if he will enforce it.

INTEROCEANIC CANAL SURVEYS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a copy of the report of the commission appointed by the President on the 15th of March, 1872, relating to the different interoceanic canal surveys and the practicability of the construction of a ship-canal across this continent; which, on motion of Mr. ANTHONY, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. BLAINE to add to the sixth section the following words:

And any military, naval, or civil officer, or any other person, who shall, except for the purposes herein named, appear armed with a deadly weapon of any description, either concealed or displayed, within a mile of any polling place where a general or special election for Representative to Congress is being held, shall, on conviction, be punished with a fine not less than five hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or with imprisonment for a period not less than six months nor more than five years, or with both fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, the weight of argument against the pending bill is not directly to the defense of an existing law which permits the use of troops at the polls, but ostensibly to legislation upon an appropriation bill, which, if passed into law, effectually dismisses United States soldiers as an element of power in American politics.

Objection is urged to legislation upon an appropriation bill which, if passed into law, will effectually prohibit the presence of United States troops at election precincts.

I have had grave doubts, not as to the power of Congress to legislate by this process, but as to the expediency of the use of that power. I say now that I think it should be rarely resorted to, and only under circumstances of emergencey or pressing necessity. The law concerning the use of the Army at the polls has proved to be a standing menace to the liberties of a free people, and I deem no duty placed upon their Representatives or those of the States superior to that of repealing an obnoxious and menacing law.

The question presented in a simple form is this: As a condition of granting supplies to the Army, has Congress a right to demand a redress of what a majority of its members deem "grievances" concerning its use?

The history of New Jersey from its earliest settlement as a province, through its colonial life and ever since its existence as a State, is filled with instruction and evidence upon this very subject; and no true representative of the example, traditions, and history of the State need doubt for a moment as to the demand of true Jerseymen upon him touching this question.

From first to last, from the day that the province contained but a handful of hardy adventurers in 1664, through all intervening years, till now counting a million and a half of people, there has been no expression of her representatives in provincial, colonial, or State Legislatures against the right to couple redress of grievances with appropriations of money. To the contrary, the assertion of this right glows through the pages of a full history and discloses the broad and enduring foundation of that singularly free government which the people of New Jersey have enjoyed from the earliest settlement of its Territory.

Nay, more, sir, the unceasing assertion of the right to couple grievances and appropriations, as made by Jerseymen, did more to quicken into active life the germ of State independence than all other controversies antedating the great revolutionary struggle.

The student of history will have small trouble to understand the quick response of the colony of New Jersey to the demand made on all liberty-loving Americans in 1776, and still less trouble to appreciate the patience, endurance, and bravery of her people through all the eventful years of our revolutionary struggle, if he considers the earlier history of the State.

The Senate will pardon the detention I give in briefly alluding to prominent facts in the record of New Jersey that to me seem to bear strongly upon what right and duty is at this hour.

PROVINCIAL HISTORY.

In 1664 an article of "concessions and agreements" was made between the lords proprietors of the Province of New Jersey, and the "adventurers," as they were styled, who had or should settle there.

Among other grants of power to the governor appointed by the lords proprietors, made under authority of the crown, the following is found:

For the better security of all the inhabitants in said province it is ordained:

First. They are not to impose nor suffer to be imposed any tax, custom, subsidy, tollage, assessment, or any other duty whatsoever, upon any color or pretense, upon the said province and inhabitants thereof, other than what shall be imposed by the authority and consent of the General Assembly, and then only in the manner as aforesaid.

Again, regarding the use of the military force of the province, this provision is made:

Fourthly. To place officers and soldiers for the safety, strength, and defense of the forts, castles, cities, &c., according to the number appointed by the General Assembly, to nominate, place, and commissionate all military officers (under the dignity of the said governor, who is commissioned by us, over the several trained bands and companies, constituted by the General Assembly,) as colonels, captains, &c., and their commissions to revoke at pleasure. The governor, with the advice of his council, * * * shall exercise the whole militia, as fully as we by the grant from his royal highness can empower them to do: Provided, That they appoint no military forces but freeholders in the said province, unless the General Assembly shall consent.

Thus, sir, it will be observed that under the first written agreement or constitution of my State, made and promulgated two hundred and fifteen years ago, and more than one hundred years before the war of the Revolution, the inhabitants of the Province of New Jersey, "being freemen," demanded and obtained:

First. The right to choose their own representatives from among themselves, to form their own Legislature, and make their own laws.

Second. To regulate all taxation and grants of money.

Third. To raise soldiers at their option; to officer them with the governor's approval. But no authority could appoint any military force save freeholders of the province, unless the General Assembly first consent.

It is needless to detain the Senate further than to call its attention to the fact that the initial page of the history of New Jersey has written upon it the complete subordination of the military to the civil power, and its absolute dependence for life upon the will and action of the people. It will be noticed that the existence of troops other than freeholders, if raised, did not depend upon the governor's consent; it hinged alone on the consent of the members of the Assembly. It will not be forgotten, in seeking an analogy, that the governor represented the lords proprietors and the British Crown thereby.

In 1681, two hundred years ago, the Province of New Jersey being divided, and called East and West Jersey, the first government of the latter was instituted, and the government under authority of the lords proprietors (and the Crown) agreed with the people of the province upon certain "fundamentals of government," which, in part, were:

First. "There shall be a general free assembly for the province, yearly and every year, at a day certain, chosen by the free people of said province"—to make laws.

Second. "That the governor of the province aforesaid, his heirs or successors, for the time being, shall not suspend or defer the signing, sealing, and confirming of such acts and laws as the General Assembly (from time to time to be elected by the free people of the province aforesaid) shall make or enact for the securing of the liberties and properties of the said free people of the province aforesaid."

Third. "That it shall not be lawful for the governor of said province, his heirs or successors, for the time being, and council, or any of them, at any time or times hereafter, to make or raise war upon any account or pretense whatsoever, or to raise any military forces within the province aforesaid, without the consent and act of the general free assembly, for the time being."

Fourth. "That it shall not be lawful for the governor of said province * * * to levy or raise any sum or sums of money, or any other tax whatsoever, without the act, consent, and concurrence of the General Assembly."

Fifth. "That no general free assembly hereafter to be chosen by the free people of the province aforesaid shall give to the governor of the said province for the time being, his heirs or successors, any tax or custom for longer time than one whole year."

The second constitution of the province, like the first, secured to the people the right of self-government, the full control of all armed forces, the taxing power, the limit of appropriations to one year, and the absolute denial of the VETO power to the governor.

It must be remembered that these assertions of "rights" were made two centuries ago by a handful of men in a then remote and sparsely settled province.

I have spoken of these agreements and "fundamentals" between the governor and the people of the province of New Jersey as having the same significance and authority as if made directly with the Crown of Great Britain, and in this assertion I am borne out by the following language, reciting the terms of the original grant from Charles II, and found reincorporated in the letters-patent of Queen Anne to the lords proprietors in 1702.

And King Charles the Second, for himself, his heirs, and successors, did give and grant to the said James Duke of York, his heirs, deputies, agents, commissioners, and assigns, full and absolute power and authority to correct, punish, pardon, govern, and rule all such subjects of the said king, his heirs and successors, as should from time to time adventure themselves into the parts and places aforesaid.

Difficulties having arisen concerning the separate government of the provinces of East and West Jersey, the proprietors, in 1702, surrendered their rights to Queen Anne, and in an article of acceptance by the queen from the proprietors of what she termed their "pretended" right of self-government, she gave at once the note of warning to the "free inhabitants" of the province and struck the spark that seventy years later was ablaze on the altar of American liberty.

Upon the acceptance by Queen Anne of the proprietary rights she appointed her cousin, Lord Cornbury, grandson to Chancellor Clarendon, governor of the consolidated provinces of New Jersey.

In the queen's commission to the governor the following clause, among others, appears:

And to the end that nothing may be passed or done by our said council or assembly to the prejudice of our heirs and successors, we will and ordain that you, the said Lord Cornbury, shall have and enjoy a negative power in the making and passing of all laws, statutes, and ordinances aforesaid; and that you shall and may likewise, from time to time, as you shall judge it necessary, adjourn, prorogue, and dissolve all general assemblies.

That no doubt might exist in the minds of the "free inhabitants" of New Jersey concerning the queen's purpose toward their assertion of the right of "free government," this additional power was placed in the royal commission. I quote from the document:

And we do hereby give and grant unto you, the said Lord Cornbury, by yourself, and by your captains and commanders, by you to be authorized, full power and authority to levy, arm, muster, command, and employ all persons whatsoever residing within our said province of Nova Cæsaria, or New Jersey; and, as occasion shall serve, them to transport from one place to another, * * * to any of our plantations in America, if necessity shall require, * * * and to do and execute all and every other thing and things which to any captain-general and governor-in-chief doth or ought of right to belong.

I may quote as a part of interesting history, rather than as information bearing directly upon the subject under discussion, another portion of the commission given by the queen to Lord and Governor Cornbury indicative of her purpose to disregard the principles underlying the assertions of the free inhabitants of the province by tempting some and forcing others to participate in the slave trade of England with Africa. The commission recites:

You are to give all due encouragement and invitation to merchants and others who shall bring trade into our said provinces, or any way contribute to the advantage thereof, and in particular to the Royal African Company of England.

And whereas we are willing to recommend unto the said company that the said province may have a constant and sufficient supply of merchantable negroes at moderate rates, in money or commodities, so you are to take special care that payment be duly made, and within a competent time according to their agreements.

Mr. President, I have quoted enough to show that the "free inhabitants" of the province of New Jersey of 1664 found themselves in 1702, thirty-eight years later, confronted by a great and pressing peril to their rights and liberties.

The lords proprietors of the province, with whom "the inhabitants" had made their "agreements" and "fundamentals," and which by their terms induced large immigration for that period from England and the continent to the favored province, finding no satisfactory advantage to themselves from their large possessions, surrendered to the Crown of Great Britain the territory it had granted to them. With the surrender of territory—so thought the queen—came also the surrender of rights. Not so believed the sturdy "free inhabitants" of Jersey. The proprietors might give away the lands remaining to them, said these "inhabitants," but they could not extinguish any privilege before derived from royal grants, relating to personal liberty, or matters of privilege, or right of free government, which, having enjoyed more than forty years, "must forever be deemed a privilege to the inhabitants."

Thus, sir, the issue was early and clearly and fully made between the representative of Great Britain and the free inhabitants of New Jersey. We have seen the claims of each. Could they have been more distinctly separated?

The right to tax, to raise and support armies, to transport them anywhere at the will of the Crown, was claimed on the one side; on the other, the right to vote for rulers, to have free assemblies, to make their own laws, to levy their own taxes, to raise or omit to raise troops, to regulate their action when raised, and, in a word, to grant supplies or not, as the representatives of the people deemed safest, wisest, best.

I will not trespass upon the Senate by a lengthy recital of the events of this most interesting period of history, following through many years the advent of the queen's new government.

It is enough to say that the people of both the provinces of East and West Jersey—theretofore in controversy and filled with jealousy of each other—became united in a common struggle for the preservation of sacred rights and against the encroachments of foreign power. The contest was long, and with men of lesser nerve and patriotism would have seemed hopeless.

I pass over the events from 1702 until 1707, when the governor required in the queen's name, that the General Assembly which the people had persisted in electing from year to year should "raise a revenue" for the support of the provincial government. What did the assembly of "free inhabitants" do, sir? The record says "they received the governor's message and resolved themselves into a committee of the whole to consider their grievances." They also sent an address to the governor, the opening of which I will delay to read:

May it please the governor, we, her majesty's loyal subjects, the representatives of the Province of New Jersey, are heartily sorry that, instead of raising such a revenue as is by the governor (as we suppose by the queen's directions) required of us, we are obliged to lay before him the unhappy circumstances of this province.

In the same address the Assembly reminds the queen's representative that he has violated the privilege of the body by assuming to judge of the qualifications of its members; of presuming to negative the selection of voting freeholders and the like—sentences which may be profitably placed against acts of our current history.

This pregnant address to the governor closes in these words, which the Senate will agree lose nothing of their truth or force because uttered one hundred and seventy years ago, or because uttered by pioneers of independence who knew their rights and dared assert them; these are the words:

Liberty is too valuable a thing to be easily parted with, and when such mean inducements procure such violent endeavors to tear it from us, we must take leave to say they have neither heads, hearts, nor souls, that are not moved with the miseries of their country, and are not forward with their utmost power lawfully to redress them.

We conclude by advising the governor to consider what it is that principally engages the affections of a people, and he will find no other artifice needful than to let them be unmolested in the enjoyment of what belongs to them of right; and a wise man that despises not his own happiness will earnestly labor to regain their love.

By order of the house:

SAMUEL JENNINGS,
Speaker, (and ex-governor.)

The answer of the arrogant ruler was in keeping with his acts of administration. In a paper, filling a small volume, he anticipates the "vengeance of just Heaven" upon them; tells them they had "little regard for the truth;" that he had urged them to "settling a revenue," and that instead of so doing they had "squandered away their time in hawking after imaginary grievances." The Assembly's answer to the governor was ever the same, "that they would raise no money till their grievances were redressed."

These grievances were ever stated with clearness; they concerned the lives, liberties, and welfare of the inhabitants of the province. Months grew into years, but the representatives of the people stood firm and resolute. If their addresses to the queen's representative grew less courteous in "stile," so that Quaker members of the Assembly, concurring in the matter of them, objected to the "stile," they grew in vigor and rung with stirring sentences. To one of the governor's charges the Assembly's reply was, quoting Nehemiah:

There is no such thing done as thou sayest, but thou feignest them out of thine own heart!

Such were the processes by which Jerseymen of early days confronted the encroachments of power. "The queen's servants were to serve her according to law;" not against their rights, they insisted. Closing one of their final addresses to the governor, and appealing from him to the queen, refusing all appropriations for the support of government meantime, these plain words were used:

If these and what we have named before be acts of mercy, gentleness, and goodnature; if this be doing for the good, welfare, and prosperity of the people of this province; if this be the administering laws for the protection and preservation of her majesty's subjects, then have we been the most mistaken men in the world and have had the falsest notion of things—calling that cruelty, oppression, and injustice which are their direct opposites, and those things slavery, imprisonment, and hardships which are freedom, liberty, and ease; and must henceforth take France, Denmark, the Muscovian, Ottoman, and eastern empires to be the best models of a gentle and happy government.

The queen at last, in 1708, deposed the obnoxious governor, and thus, after a contest that in greater or less degree had lasted through years, the free inhabitants of New Jersey were vindicated in their assertion of the right of self-government.

The new governor, Lord Lovelace, lived but a short time, and was succeeded in 1710 by Governor Hunter. The Assembly's reception of him was cordial, and through all the years of his administration no serious misunderstanding occurred twixt him and the representatives. But the key-note of the Assembly's purposes toward the representative of the queen is found in this sentence of their address of welcome: "We have always thought it equally reasonable to support a government, and to deny that support to tyranny and oppression."

Here, sir, is found, in unmistakable words uttered by freemen, few in number but resolute of purpose, not only the living, glorious creed of their insistence, but the very life and essence of that immortal Declaration of Principles that seventy years later declared these States free and independent.

Mr. President, if I have somewhat detained the Senate by a partial and imperfect recital of the political history of the province that is now a "free and independent State," of which I am a representative, my apology will not need be made to her citizens, at least, who love their State's history and revere its traditions.

The border State of the Revolution, every acre of whose soil was trod by contending armies and every power of whose people was freely given to compel the liberties of all the peoples of all the "old thirteen"—I can do no better service to my State, to my people, to my country, at this period when partisan feeling is blinding patriotic judgment, than to remind Senators that it is as true now under this great Government as it was one hundred and seventy years ago under provincial New Jersey, "that it is equally reasonable to support a government, and to deny that support to tyranny and oppression."

THE POWER OF CONGRESS OVER THE ARMY.

Mr. President, objection is made to what is termed the coercive quality of the proposed legislation regarding the use of the Army.

The powers of Congress conferred by the Constitution and enumerated in section 8 of that article are well known to the Senate. They are as follows, sixteen in number:

SECTION VIII.

The Congress shall have power

1. To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States;
2. To borrow money on the credit of the United States;
3. To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes;
4. To establish an uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States;
5. To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures;
6. To provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States;
7. To establish post-offices and post-roads;
8. To promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries;
9. To constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court;
10. To define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offenses against the law of nations;
11. To declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water;
12. To raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years;
13. To provide and maintain a navy;
14. To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces;
15. To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrections and repel invasions;
16. To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

It will be observed that of these powers, explicitly conferred, only two of them have any reservation whatever attached to them. The first is to compel uniformity in laying duties, imposts, and excises in the States, and the second concerns the existence and support of the Army.

These are the words of the Constitution:

The Congress shall have power * * * to raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years.

When this provision of the Constitution was put before the Federal convention framing that instrument Mr. Gerry, of Massachusetts, objected to any provision looking to a standing army or any grant of money to the military for a longer period than one year. To this Mr. Sherman, of Connecticut, replied that as each Congress would last two years it would be more convenient to make but one appropriation for this service with each Congress; and that the convention would remember that the Congress, under the Constitution, was only "permitted," not "required," to appropriate money for the Army.

With this understanding on the part of the convention, the short debate, and the only debate of consequence regarding this grant of power to Congress, ceased; and the clause was adopted without division.

Constitutionally, appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of Government, for the Navy even, may be made, both as to amount and time, at the discretion of the Congress; but appropriations for the Army, and for this branch of the public service alone, are surrounded by a restriction.

Thus did the framers of the Constitution declare that of all the elements of powers given under the fundamental law, this one alone, the Army, should forever be a dependent one.

The Army, so the Constitution declares, shall be reviewed as to its cost, its composition, and its acts by every new representative of the people, by every new Congress, and every two years.

It, of all the agencies of Government, is alone compelled to this review within a given and very limited period.

Its longest tenure of life is but two years.

Its breath is forever at the mercy of a mere majority of either branch of Congress, and not infrequently at the mercy of a single person exercising the executive power

Not even the Navy, the twin power of the Army, holds its life by such frail tenure. Appropriations may be made for that service as far ahead as Congress may deem proper; only the Army is the subject of constitutional warning.

Mr. President, we may safely assume that the founders of this Government did not count upon the absolute continuance of this arm of the service for the peace, prosperity, or perpetuity of the Government.

Would it not be most absurd, sir, in view of the well-known facts I have called the Senate's attention to, to speak of any restriction that Congress may choose to put upon the Army, or even the utter denial of any appropriation for its support, as "revolutionary?"

If it be said, sir, that some military power is essential to the preservation of the peace and the maintenance of the dignity, and at times the perpetuity, of the Government, I agree.

But, sir, the whole history of legislation concerning the Army of the United States, although mainly liberal, and justly so, indicate that its peace organization is not an element of indispensable power, and which by itself will suffice for the maintenance of order. That duty rests upon the States and their officers. Nor is its existence essential to the perpetuity of the Government; that charge is sacredly held by the people.

The Army is and ever will be, under our theory of government, the valuable nucleus of that other and supreme power, held by the States and by the people, and which, thus considered and used, has been found in every exigency all-sufficient for the purposes of its creation.

No man in this body is more friendly to the Army of the United States than I am. I am proud of its men and their achievements. Its fame and its history form a large part of the honorable record of the nations of earth.

But, sir, I would be lost to all sense of truth and remembrance of history if I admitted for a moment the monstrous and dangerous doctrine that this Government held its power, far less its life, in a period of peace, through the existence of its Army, or that its total disbandment would bring serious danger to the Government.

No, sir, when upon this branch of service alone the fundamental law of the land has placed the close and continuous grip of the representatives of the people and of the States, I cannot be brought to believe that any action concerning its use, whether on the frontier or on the seaboard, whether to treat the people of a State as "banditti" or to attempt to throttle the people of all the States by impertinent, dangerous, and illegal interference at the polls, is beyond the clear, absolute, and never-to-be-yielded power of Congress.

Nay, more, sir, it rises higher than a power which may be held in abeyance; it is the great duty of Congress to limit, confine, and restrict the use of its military arm to what it deems wise and safe; not what some other department may deem wise and safe, but what Congress may. That other department is the constitutional commander of the Army when it exists, but its existence is at the breath of Congress alone, as its death, so far as sustenance goes, may be contemporaneous almost with the power which gives it support.

Whatever arguments may be adduced as to legislation on appropriation bills other than that for the Army, it is clear the framers of the Constitution contemplated giving to Congress, and did give to Congress, every needed control over the Army as to its cost, its use, and its very life.

Because, Mr. President, we speak of the Army as a force apart from the people we are charged with hostility to it. Nothing could be less true. A free people, however, will ever look with jealous eye upon any great military force within their domain, knowing that every page of history warns them against the tendencies of military power. An army must needs be a force apart from the people. Its composition and its usefulness compel it to be so. The laws which govern it are those of blind, implicit, unreasoning obedience as to its main constituent. Against the most revolting service that may be assigned to it by a partisan President, or a political general-in-chief if such happen to be in command, there is no escape. Have we not seen battle-scarred men and officers put to the ignoble and distasteful labor of protecting thieves and usurpers in sovereign States? Have we not seen brave men commanding batteries of United States guns brought into this very city pending the decision of Congress as to who was the rightful President? It is safe to say that three-fourths of all these officers and men hated the duty put upon them, but they performed it.

No, sir; the Army is like a choice and essential weapon. It must only be in responsible hands, ever ready and rarely used.

Mr. President, I have been witness to the use of the troops of the United States, protecting so-called officials of a State government, as they trod upon the liberties of citizens and the rights of the State. I have seen the military power of this Government put forth within three years—the Senator from Maine will observe, within three years—and successfully put forth, and unlawfully put forth, and by the President of the United States, to keep one pretended State Legislature in power and another from its rights; and of that Legislature thus unlawfully and forcibly kept in scarce one of them to-day is not an inmate of a penitentiary, under indictment for mean crime, or a fugitive from justice.

This was the class of "citizens" that the Army of the United States was compelled to "protect and defend" against the people's own.

Can ours be an idle warning to a free people that have seen and felt the usurping power? Will it be said, sir, that no president of a republic will dare to misuse this power?

I know to the contrary. I had the honor to bear a message in 1876 from Governor (now Senator) HAMPTON to the then President of the United States, requesting him to withdraw his troops from the State-house of South Carolina in deference to a decision of the supreme and highest court of that State. I urged the importance of it with all the force of appropriate language at my command. I told the President that in the judgment of eminent lawyers the governor, then out of office by expiration of his term, had not lawfully invoked the assistance of Federal power inasmuch as he had made no effort to convene his Legislature, though easily done, and obtain their action on a matter so vital; that the newly elected governor desired the attendance of the representatives of the people in their State-house, from which Federal bayonets—as I myself knew—kept them. And finally, that the contest being one of purely State concern, regarding only the claims of State officers, and these having been definitively settled by the highest legal tribunal that could ever take cognizance of the case—i. e., the supreme court of South Carolina—I urged that the Federal forces should be promptly withdrawn from the State capital.

You may imagine, sir, my astonishment and indignation when, in angry tone and uncivil manner, the President replied, "I won't withdraw the troops; I don't regard the decision of the supreme court, and if I had any message to send to General HAMPTON it would be that his message to me is an impertinence!"

"An impertinence," sir, for the governor of a State to communicate his wishes, not demand his rights as he might properly have done, to the President of the United States! An impertinence, indeed!

> Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed,
> That he is grown so great?

No, Mr. President, we cannot make too much haste to guard the liberties of freemen everywhere in this broad land from the chance of blotting the pages of our history with a repetition of the usurping act of a President less than three years ago.

I may repeat, sir, in conclusion, in the earnest, forcible, and stirring language of the patriot Jennings, speaker of the New Jersey Assembly, in his address to the representative of Britain's queen more than a century and a half ago: "Liberty is too valuable a thing to be easily parted with; and where such mean inducements procure such violent endeavors to tear it from us they have neither heads, hearts, nor souls that are not moved with the miseries of their country, and are not forward, with their utmost power, lawfully to redress them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.] Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. CONKLING. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 6 the following:

> And any military, naval, or civil officer, or any other person, who shall, except for the purposes herein named, appear armed with a deadly weapon of any description, either concealed or displayed, within a mile of any polling place where a general or special election for Representative to Congress is being held, shall, on conviction, be punished with a fine not less than five hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or with imprisonment for a period not less than six months nor more than five years, or with both fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question? The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BAYARD. I merely desire to say, Mr. President, that an arrangement seems to have been made in the Senate in discussing the Army appropriation bill with the disputed provisions, which has not been known heretofore,—at least it has not been known to me,—that gentlemen who desired to be heard on this bill and make expression of their views had furnished their names to the Chair, and that they were to be recognized by the Chair in a certain order of debate. I have heard of such arrangement with surprise, for I have never known this arrangement made in the Senate before, nor do I myself become a party to it. I confess that I prefer that easy, and I may add, that dignified course that the Senate has heretofore always observed in respect of its deliberations, that debate is unlimited except in the discretion of the members, that it would be so continued, and that the convenience of Senators was to be considered as to the time when they proposed to submit their views to the Senate.

But understanding that this new arrangement had been made, I consulted the Chair and obtained a view of a list containing certain names put down there for the purpose of this debate. To my great surprise, while that list is not nearly exhausted, I find the question suddenly about to be brought to a vote before the Senate.

I do desire to lay before the Senate and the country my view of the real issue connected with the proposed regulation of the uses to which the Army of the United States may be put contained within the bill that provides for their existence; but to do that properly or in a manner to be in any degree satisfactory for myself, I should crave of the Senate a few hours' notice at least. Upon a question of this kind, which soars far beyond the mere question of pecuniary expenditure, which touches in its very essence the liberty of the American people, I do not think it unreasonable, when called upon by this dislocation of arrangement which I supposed had been made and was to be carried out, that I should ask for a delay of a few hours.

I should have no objection to a vote being taken upon the amendment of the Senator from Maine. It is not that to which I propose to address myself, but it is to the other question of the right and not only the right but the duty of the Congress of the United States in providing money for the existence of an armed force to couple it with such regulations as shall prevent that armed force from being used in a manner inconsistent with public safety. I do desire the opportunity to show that force, armed force, cannot be emancipated from the harness of the law; that the Army is but the creation of the law; it is the arm of a government of laws; and in providing funds for its existence the law to regulate its use is as much a duty to be combined in the very same act as any other duty that possibly can devolve upon the representatives of a people.

I am willing, therefore, to take the vote upon the amendment of the honorable Senator from Maine and not delay the Senate further at this time; but I shall ask that the main question lie over until to-morrow morning, if the Senate shall adjourn until to-morrow only, in order that I may, in the performance of that which I believe to be my duty, state my reasons for insisting that Congress has no right or power in a bill providing money to raise armies to avoid the regulation of the use to which those armies shall be put in the same bill that provides money for their support.

Mr. ANTHONY. I quite agree with the Senator from Delaware in his objection to the innovation of making a list of Senators to speak in order. I think it much better to leave the matter to the discretion and the impulses, and the desires of Senators. I think the request which the Senator makes is a very reasonable one, and I would be willing that the amendment should lie over until to-morrow if he prefers to speak on the amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. I prefer to speak to-morrow.

Mr. GORDON. Not on this amendment?

Mr. BAYARD. Not on this amendment; I care nothing for this amendment; I am prepared to vote against it now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no need of merely taking a vote on the amendment; that will not speed the bill any. If the matter is to go over until to-morrow, it may as well go over open, so that the whole thing can be disposed of after the debate is through. There is no use in taking a vote now. I see the Senator from Maine himself is not in the Chamber. He might wish to submit something further in support of his amendment.

Mr. WITHERS. I merely wish to state that so far as the arrangements are concerned, I know of none beyond those which have heretofore prevailed in this body ever since I have been a member of it. I know that it has been customary for the President of the Senate, when several gentlemen were expected to speak upon a pending proposition, to put down their names so as to afford him some guide at least in recognizing them in case several rose together. I know of nothing more in the present case. If it be an evil, it is an evil that has been in existence ever since I have been a member of this body.

I have no objection whatever that the Senator from Delaware shall have an opportunity of making the remarks which he proposes to submit to the Senate at such time as suits his convenience, but I do not see why we cannot vote upon the pending amendment without at all interfering with his purpose. If the Senate is now ready to take a vote upon that amendment I see no reason why we should not vote upon it, and then the question will come up upon any other amendment or upon the bill on its merits.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The Senator from Delaware has referred to a list that he supposed was in the hands of the President of the Senate, and that the names of Senators on that list had been taken up by the President in the order in which they appeared. I want to say so far as I am concerned that I asked the President of the Senate whether I should interfere with any one by speaking this morning, and until this morning I had made no request upon the subject whatever. I spoke this morning simply because there was no one else to occupy the attention of the Senate. I do not think anything could have been more modest than that.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair begs leave to make an explanation before Senators proceed further. When the present incumbent of the chair took the chair he found a list in the handwriting of the Vice-President of names of Senators, some of whom had spoken and some of whom were put down to speak on this bill. The list had been followed up to that time, and the Chair understood that it was the intention of the Vice-President to follow it up. That list has been extended as one speaker after another addressed the Senate and others came and requested to be put down upon it. The Chair was not aware that it was an unusual proceeding at all, because in the actual knowledge of the Chair it has been done a dozen times since the Chair has been a member of the Senate. The Chair wishes to say further that if it is a practice disagreeable to the Senate it shall be abolished.

Mr. HAMLIN. I wish only to suggest that I think the practice is wrong from beginning to end. I confess I never heard of it until yesterday. I never knew of a list as I do now learn there have been heretofore lists prepared. It is bringing into this body a practice that grew up in the other House. There may be a necessity for it in a large body like that; there is none here. It is objectionable in this point of view: the presiding officer of this body, be he whom he may, will hold the reins with an impartial hand, and he will be sure to see, in the exercise of the power with which the rule clothes him, that even-handed justice is done. Now, a Senator speaks upon this side of the Chamber, and he may in his remarks render it eminently proper and just that a certain Senator on the other side should reply to him, and that Senator may desire to do so at that time. The Senator upon this side may discuss questions of a local character, of a personal character, and a variety of subjects that render it more proper that some one Senator upon the other side should answer than that others should. If that Senator rises at the same time with another Senator, I say that it is appropriate that the discretion of the Chair should come in and he should assign the floor to that Senator who would most appropriately speak at that time. Hence your rigid rules are all wrong. They would make a Procrustean bed at both ends. I do not want to see it cut off at more than one end, and I would a little rather not see it upon either end. The Chair will do better than any rule of formality, and if it has been heretofore innovated upon I do hope the Senate will, as the Chair has suggested, depart from it.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, it is probable that the difficulty which is presented to the Senate this morning has originated from the fact that I did not take the floor to discuss this question at the time that I had intended to do so. I was not a party to any arrangement under which a list was prepared, but I did have an understanding with the Vice-President, who was then presiding in the Senate, that on the day before yesterday I should like to have the floor for the purpose of discussing this bill. I took the floor for that purpose. It became a duty of justice as well as of courtesy that I should yield my right to the floor to the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES;] and in yielding my right I said that hereafter, at some time of this debate, I would ask the attention of the Senate to some remarks that I desired to submit upon it, not designating any particular time when I might see proper to come forward and present those views.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. RANDOLPH] took the floor this morning, as he has stated, because no one else occupied it. He might have gone further and said that there were Senators on this side of the Chamber who very much desired to hear him upon the very interesting topic which he brought to the attention of the country, the history of New Jersey in connection with the proposition to control the destinies of this country through a standing army. I did not intend, as I announced yesterday, to participate in this debate until it became necessary to do so in vindication of the southern people. I stated, and I stated correctly, that the proposition to repeal this law now standing on the statute-book was a proposition that came from a democratic member of the House of Representatives during the last Congress from a northern State, and that so far no southern Senator had debated this proposition as a political question.

The honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] having charge of this bill made some explanation of its principles, but he did not go into the political phases of the question at all. I thought that his course upon that subject was entirely correct. After having made up my mind first that I would undertake to address the Senate on the subject, I thought it better to allow the debate to become exhausted between gentlemen who live on the northern side of the line that divided the people of the United States in their recent great troubles, so that this question, as far as we possibly could arrange it, should be discussed without reference to the bearing which the late rebellion might have upon it; that it might be discussed as a question of pure constitutional law, as a question which concerned the most vital interests and liberties of this country in all the different sections.

The honorable Senator from Delaware seems to have been misled by the idea, I suppose, that I was to occupy the floor to-day; but he did not do me the honor to listen to my remarks on yesterday when I declared my purpose not to interfere in this discussion until the debate had exhausted itself between Senators from the Northern States and until it became necessary, if it should ever become necessary, that some gentleman from the South should rise on the floor of the Senate for the purpose of vindicating the action of the people of the South in reference to the legislation of Congress since 1865. I have not seen any occasion as yet for entering upon that vindication. It is very true that much has been said which is calculated to arouse feeling and to engender animosity between the sections of this country, but so far as I am concerned (and I think that is the feeling which pervades the entire South) we intend to discuss this question without reference to those events which are calculated to irritate the public judgment. We intend to try, so far as we are concerned, to bring this subject soberly to the attention of the people of the United States, so that they may consider it just as freely to-day as if they were considering it a hundred years from this day.

We regard it as a great constitutional question, a great question of the liberty of the people of this country, which ought to be entirely separated from all arguments which might arise upon the recent disturbances between the South and the North, and which ought to be decided solely with reference to its future influence upon the destinies of this great country, in which I hope that we have at least equal interest with the other sections of the American Union; and in reference to which I believe that we have also a thorough, full, complete, patriotic purpose of endeavoring to form the policy of this Government so that we can assist all the different sections of the United States in the development of the true glory of the American nation, or Union, or Government, or whatever else you please to call it; so that we can assist to the utmost of our power and ability to make it "a government of the people, for the people, and by the people," believing as we do that the people have the capacity to govern themselves, that they have the patriotism to do it honestly and justly, and that they are just as wise in the exercise of the powers of government in the localities where these different State governments are found as they are in Congress; and that they have in these State governments men to make laws and men to administer laws who are quite as wise, and quite as honest, and quite as good, and quite as well-informed as the delegates whom they send here either to the Senate or the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, I think it is proper, I think it is prudent also, that the Senators from the Southern States should not interfere in this debate until those from the Northern States who are not incriminated in any venture of rebellion against this Government should be fully heard by the country; and when we do come forward, if come forward we shall at all, it ought to be for the purpose of showing, as I think we can demonstrate, that since 1865, since we have been readmitted into our Federal relations, the people of the South as represented in both branches of Congress have not attempted at all to interfere with that series of measures which were called war measures, some of which still linger upon the statute-book. We prefer, so far as we are concerned, not to attempt to make a repeal of those measures upon our own responsibility. We prefer to outlive them. We have outlived them. Our being here to-day represented on the floor of the Senate and on the floor of the House of Representatives is not due to the fact that those measures have been removed from the statute-book or that they have been broken down by public opinion, but it is due to the fact that we have, as was stated by the honorable Senator from Indiana yesterday, by a patient course of honest obedience to law, outlived the consequences of those fatal measures. We know perfectly well that in a very large degree, if not entirely, the strength which the people of the South exhibit to-day upon the floor of the Senate and House of Representatives is due to the fact that the republican party of the United States have coerced or attempted to coerce the people in the casting of their ballots and in the conduct of their local affairs, and that this very coercion exercised through deputy marshals, through supervisors of election, and through the military power in the Southern States has been above all others the great cause of the consolidation of the southern people.

Therefore, Mr. President, I did not desire, and do not now desire to enter into this debate for the purpose of discussing this great question upon its merits. I merely desire, and I only intend, so far as I am concerned, to engage in the debate for the purpose of showing that these measures of coercion which have been placed upon the statute-book have been the very measures of all others which have contributed most to the consolidation of the Southern States.

I trust that the honorable Senator from Delaware will have an opportunity of proceeding to discuss this question at his leisure. I trust that the Senate will not force a vote upon this question to-day, inasmuch as the Senator has evidently been misled by what he supposed to be an arrangement between Senators in reference to the course of this debate, and has thereby been deprived of an opportunity, as I suppose to-day, of proceeding with his remarks. So far as I am concerned I shall not only yield the floor to him with great pleasure, but I hope that he and other Senators on both sides of this Chamber from the Northern States shall proceed with this discussion, and enter fully upon all the matters that they think bear upon the best interests of this country.

Mr. GROOME. Mr. President, it is fortunate that man is so constituted that he can forget much and forgive more. But it was not to be expected that any one could so soon forget the wrongs perpetrated in the recent past upon the people of the loyal State of Maryland by the military arm of the Government during the period that it held control there, and it would be unfortunate for the cause of constitutional liberty if the patriotic heart could ever learn to forgive them.

I was not, therefore, surprised when the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] in his speech on Tuesday last, asked me concerning them, but to have attempted to answer his question then at length would have been to interrupt him at a time when he was warmed up with his subject and presenting his views upon it with great power. I therefore forbore to answer him at that time.

But as I fully agree with him that the interference by the General Government with the freedom of an election in a State, at the time in full relations with the Union and the overwhelming majority of whose people intend to maintain those relations, and no portion of whose soil is invaded or threatened by hostile forces, can find no excuse in the fact that the Government was at the time engaged elsewhere in a struggle for its existence with other States which had attempted to sever their connection with it; and as I believe what has been once done in a time of excitement is likely to be again done in times either of great excitement or of urgent political necessity—as in fact we have had a very recent example of how far our political opponents sometimes go in the way of availing themselves of the forms of law to defeat the popular will when brought face to face with what they consider the imperative necessity of maintaining their party supremacy—I cannot but feel that it is extremely important that the Senate and the country should be reminded of the extent to which the General Government has gone in interfering of its own motion with the freedom of elections in the loyal State of Maryland.

I shall therefore take this occasion to answer the question of the Senator from Kentucky, and I do not propose to discuss the general question as to the necessity or propriety of repealing the clause of the act of February, 1865, permitting by way of exception to the general words of prohibition the General Government, without being called upon by the State authorities, to use troops or armed men to keep the peace at the polls, further than a statement of the facts concerning the military interference with the freedom of elections in Maryland and of the motives which induced that interference can be considered as such discussion.

I will state that, on several occasions during the late war, at the stated periods when by the constitution and laws of the State of Maryland her people were called upon to select their rulers the military power of the General Government was exerted to the utmost to prevent them from exercising any freedom of choice, and to compel them to accept such rulers as the Administration thought would best subserve its purposes, and hence what was by courtesy called an election was but a solemn mockery of the forms of law.

The interference by the military assumed many forms. Proclamations were issued which were intended to intimidate and prevent voters who were opposed to the ticket favored by the military from coming to the polls. Test oaths of the most searching character, for which there was no legal warrant, were established, and the judges of election were forbidden under heavy penalties to accept the ballot of any person who declined to take them, and many persons who were able and willing to take them were by the military refused permission to do so or to vote. Many persons in every part of the State who were legally entitled to vote were prevented from doing so, while soldiers who were known to be non-residents were permitted to vote in some instances without challenge and in others in spite of challenge. Wholesale arrests of unoffending citizens were made, and judges of election were threatened with arrest if they dared to disobey the military edicts, and in the few instances where they were bold enough so to do the threat was carried into effect. At one or more of the elections armed soldiers surrounded some of the polling places, and prevented such persons as they did not desire to vote from approaching them. At other polling places the voter had to approach the ballot-box between soldiers with drawn sabers. At still others the military officers sat in the room with the judges and challenged and rejected votes at their pleasure, examined the tickets as they were presented, and permitted none but the favored ticket to be voted. In a word, the military scrupled at nothing which was required to defeat the will of the people and to secure the result desired by the Administration of the General Government.

In November, 1861, there was an election for governor and other State officers and for members of the State Legislature. General John A. Dix, who was then military commander of what was known as the middle department, issued the following proclamation:

All persons are requested to point out to the judges of election and to the police any individual attempting to vote, or who may be present at the polls, who may have been actually engaged in acts of hostility to the United States or in actively aiding and abetting those in arms against the United States, and especially those who, on the 19th of April and subsequent days, took part in opposing the march of the United States troops, or in transmitting stores and supplies or forwarding persons or communications into States engaged in the rebellion.

Upon the 19th of April, 1861, the utmost efforts of the entire police department of Baltimore failed to some extent to protect a Massachusetts regiment, which unexpectedly appeared on the streets of that city, from the violence of a hastily improvised mob. As, in the days of terrible excitement which followed close upon that ever-to-be-regretted day, almost the entire adult population of the city was under arms to prevent the passage of other regiments through it, which it was currently reported had threatened to reduce it to ashes, the terms of General Dix's proclamation were sufficiently broad to justify the arrest of almost every one. And every person who approached the polls fully understood that he did so at the imminent risk of arrest, unless he voted as was desired by the military authorities. An election so conducted could have but one result, the selection of the ticket favored by the Government by an overwhelming majority.

Nor was the interference of the military at this election mitigated by the fact that the ticket which was elected would have been chosen, although by a majority greatly reduced, (as I admit would unquestionably have been the case,) if the people had been permitted to vote without interference and intimidation according to their desires. The character of the act does not depend upon the question whether it actually changed the result of the election, but upon the question whether it was intended to defeat the popular will. Unless it had that intent it was meaningless.

There was another general election in the State on November 4, 1863, for State officers, a Legislature, and members of Congress, at which military interference was carried even further. A few days before it took place General Schenck, who was then in command of the department, issued his famous—perhaps I should more properly say infamous—General Order No. 53, in which, after reciting that there were many evil-disposed persons at large in the State, he ordered, among other things—

That all provost-marshals and other military officers do arrest all such persons found at or hanging about or approaching any poll or place of election on the 4th of November, 1863, and report such arrest to these headquarters.

Governor Bradford wrote a letter to President Lincoln earnestly protesting against the use of the Army, as proposed by General Schenck's military order, to control the election, in the course of which he used this language:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, ANNAPOLIS, October 31, 1863.

To His Excellency President LINCOLN:

SIR: Rumors are to-day current, and they reach me in such a shape that I am bound to believe them, that detachments of soldiers are to be dispatched on Monday next to several of the counties of the State with a view of being present at their polls on Wednesday next, the day of our State election. These troops are not residents of the State, and consequently are not sent for the purpose of voting; and as there is no reason, in my opinion, to apprehend any riotous or violent proceedings at this election, the inference is unavoidable that these military detachments, if sent, are expected to exert some control or influence in that election. I am also informed that orders are to be issued from this military department on Monday presenting certain restrictions or qualifications on the right of suffrage, of what precise character I am not apprised, which the judges of election will be expected to observe.

Then he adds:

I cannot but feel that to suffer any military interference in the matter of our election, or to prescribe any test of oath to voters when all the candidates in the State—with the exception, perhaps, of two or three in one congressional district—are all loyal men, would be justly obnoxious to the public sentiment of the State.

The President, after waiting until it was too late for his action to be made known throughout the State prior to the election, made some modification of General Schenck's order, but permitted it to stand as modified. Governor Bradford then issued his proclamation directing the judges of the election to conduct it under the laws of the State, and General Schenck issued an order to the newspapers forbidding them to publish the governor's proclamation, and laid an embargo on all steam-vessels trading with that part of the State to which troops were sent to prevent the governor's proclamation from reaching it until after the election. The military forces were scattered throughout that portion of the State east of the Chesapeake Bay and known as the Eastern Shore. When the commander of a cavalry regiment had reached the Eastern Shore he issued a proclamation which shows so plainly what is meant by the General Government "keeping the peace at the polls" by the aid of the military that I quote it entire:

HEADQUARTERS THIRD MARYLAND CAVALRY,
Chestertown, Maryland, November 2, 1863.

Whereas the President of the United States, in reply to a letter addressed to him by Hon. Thomas Swann, of Baltimore City, has stated that all loyal, qualified voters should have a right to vote, it therefore becomes every truly loyal citizen to avail honorably upon the record or poll-books at the approaching election by giving a full and ardent support to the whole Government ticket, upon the platform adopted by the Union League convention. None other is recognized by the Federal authorities as loyal or worthy of the support of any one who desires the peace and restoration of this Union.

CHARLES CARROLL TEVIS,
Lieutenant-Colonel Commanding.

O shade of the heroic Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, whose memory Maryland honors as the noblest of her sons who signed the Declaration of Independence for his fearless patriotism and unselfish, unfaltering love of liberty, what a desecration of thy honored name for this base minion of arbitrary power, who for the paltry honor of commanding a regiment was willing to accept the ignoble service of preventing the people of a sovereign State from exercising that right of self-government which thou risked so much to secure for them, to vaunt himself thy namesake!

How the military order was carried into effect, and how the modifications of the President and the proclamation of the governor of Maryland were disregarded, can best be told in the language of Hon. A. W. Bradford, the loyal governor of Maryland. I quote from his message to the Legislature in January, 1864. The governor said:

I avail myself of this occasion to advert to certain events connected with our recent election which deserve your most serious consideration.

He then adds:

A few days before that election a military order was issued from the Army headquarters at Baltimore which in effect placed the polls under the surveillance and at the command of the military authority.

I was the less prepared for any such order from the fact that though in frequent personal communication with the military authorities of the department, I had received no intimation whatever of such a proceeding or of any supposed necessity for it. In that part of the State against which the movement seemed to be more particularly directed—the Eastern Shore—there would seem to have been less necessity as there certainly was less semblance of authority than elsewhere; for while martial law had been proclaimed upon the Western Shore of the State in June last, and had not been repealed up to the day of election, upon the Eastern Shore it had never been proclaimed at all.

You will be furnished with a copy of this order and it is not necessary further to recite it than to state in general terms that it was to be executed by the military, aided by the provost-marshals. They were to arrest voters whom they might consider disloyal approaching or hanging about the polls; a prescribed form of an oath was furnished, without taking which, no one, if challenged, could vote; and the several commanding officers were charged to report to headquarters any judge of election who should refuse to administer that oath or to aid in carrying out that order. The President modified the first part of the order on the Monday preceding the election, but even that modification seemed to receive no attention from those intrusted with its execution, and was in some instances openly disregarded.

Prominent among the provost-marshals to whom the execution of this order was in part committed were several who were themselves candidates for important offices.

These marshals appointed for the purpose of the militia enrollment and draft were placed by the law creating them under the control of the provost-marshal-general, but to insure the right to employ them about this election order, special authority was obtained from Washington to place them for the time being under the orders of the military authorities.

If with these facts before me, and seeing the judges of election, sworn to conduct it according to the laws of the State, openly menaced with arrest unless they recognized the military authority and conducted it by the rules which that authority prescribed, I had stood silently by and failed to assure them of the protection of the State to the extent of its ability, I should have felt myself utterly unworthy of the place of its chief magistrate.

I therefore on the Monday evening preceding the election issued a proclamation giving them this assurance, a copy of which is herewith submitted.

Before the following morning military orders were sent to the Eastern Shore, directing its circulation to be suppressed, the public papers were forbidden to publish it, and an embargo laid on all the steamers in port trading with that part of the State lest they might carry it.

* * * * * * *

On the day preceding the election the officer in command of the regiment which had been distributed among the counties of the Eastern Shore, and who had himself landed in Kent County, commenced his operations by arresting and sending across the bay some ten or more of the most estimable and distinguished of its citizens, including several of the most steadfast and uncompromising loyalists of the shore. The jail of the county was entered, the jailor seized, imprisoned, and afterward sent to Baltimore, and prisoners confined therein under indictment were set at liberty. The commanding officer referred to gave the first clue to the character of the disloyalty against which he considered himself as particularly commissioned, by printing and publishing a proclamation.

And then the governor sets out the substance of the proclamation which I have already read in full. He then adds:

To secure the election of that ticket seemed to be the business to which he and his officers especially devoted themselves throughout the day of election. In the statements and certificates which have been forwarded to me from different counties in that congressional district I have been furnished I presume with an account of part only of the outrages to which their citizens were subjected. The "Government ticket" above referred to was in several if not in all of these counties designated by its color (it was a yellow ticket) and armed with that a voter could safely run the gauntlet of the sabers and carbines that guarded the entrance to the polls, and known sympathizers with the rebellion were, as certified to me, allowed to vote unquestioned if they would vote that ticket, while loyal and respected citizens, ready to take the oath, were turned back by the officers in charge without even allowing them to approach the polls.

In one district, as appears by certificate from the judge, the military officer took his stand at the polls before they were opened declaring that none but the "yellow ticket" should be voted, and excluded all others throughout the day. In another district a similar officer caused every ballot offered to be examined, and unless it was the favored one the voter was required to take the oath, and not otherwise; and in another again, after one vote only had been given, the polls were closed, the judges all arrested and sent out of the county, and military occupation taken of the town.

But I will not detain you with a recapitulation of all the abuses that these statements disclose. I have caused copies of them to be transmitted to you and they cannot fail to arrest your attention. They present a humiliating record, such as I had never supposed we should be called upon to read in any State, still less in a loyal one like this. Unless it be indeed a fallacy to suppose that any rights whatever remain to such a State, or that any line whatever marks the limit of Federal power, a bolder stride across that line that power never made even in a rebel State than it did here on the 4th of last November.

A part of the Army which a generous people had supplied for a very different purpose was on that day engaged in stifling the freedom of election in a faithful State, intimidating its sworn officers, violating the constitutional rights of its loyal citizens, and obstructing the usual channels of communication between them and their executive.

Then he adds:

If men interested in accomplishing certain political results can by any influence enlist in their behalf such a tremendous instrument of power as was here employed, no election will probably ever occur in which the same means will not be again attempted.

This is the language of a governor who was the candidate of the extreme Unionists of the State, and who during the term of his office proved himself so pronounced a "loyalist," to use the designation so fashionable at that day, that when a confederate raiding party crossed over into Maryland, it, in retaliation for a similar outrage committed by the Union soldiery upon the property of Governor Letcher, of Virginia, set fire to and destroyed his private residence, a loss for which he has never been reimbursed. It is the language of a governor who was so decided an emancipationist that in the same message from which I have quoted he, with a view to securing the abolition of slavery in the State, urged the Legislature, itself elected by reason of the military interference he so properly denounced, to submit to the people the question whether or not they desired a constitutional convention, although he could not but know that the elections to decide whether or not that convention should be called and whether its work should be adopted or rejected, must be held under such circumstances that their results, although they must be acquiesced in, could by no means be accepted as fairly indicative of the popular will.

To show that this interference with the election of November, 1863, was not prompted by any fear that persons deemed by the military authorities "disloyal" might obtain possession of the machinery of the State government, it is only necessary to quote from the proclamation of General Schenck "to the loyal people of Maryland," issued on November 3, 1863, the day before the State election. That proclamation contains this language:

Governor Bradford himself cannot appreciate more highly than I do the sterling loyalty of the great majority of the people of Maryland.

What, then, was the cause of the military interference with this election? The answer is not hard to find. In the spring of 1861, when certain of the States had attempted to sever their connection with the General Government, and when the large majority of the people of the Union were anxiously hoping that by adopting some plan of conciliation and compromise these States could be induced to return to their allegiance, the leaders of the republican party, who had secretly resolved that such return should not be permitted until the institution of slavery could be abolished, so cunningly prepared their plans as to bring about a crisis, in which the South was betrayed into the fatal mistake of firing upon the flag of our common country. Instantly the men of the North, inflamed with patriotic ardor, sprang to arms, to fight, as they were assured and believed, for the restoration of the Union, with all the rights of the States and the people under the Constitution unimpaired and guaranteed. But as the struggle progressed it soon became evident to all close observers that it was not waged solely for the restoration of the Union, and a reaction set in which threatened to send a majority to the lower House of Congress opposed to the Administration. Maryland at that time elected her members of the National House of Representatives only one month before the meeting of Congress in December, and after the congressional elections had taken place in all the other States except one or two. If left to themselves, the people of the State would have elected on the Western Shore three Congressmen opposed to the Administration and one favorable to it, and on the Eastern Shore they would have elected Hon. John W. Crisfield, an able lawyer and a sincere Unionist, but one who could not be depended on to vote in favor of an amendment to the Constitution abolishing slavery, or in favor of any scheme of the Administration believed by him to be violative of the Constitution. If this result had been permitted to be accomplished, the Administration would have been unable to organize the House of Representatives. It therefore determined that the Maryland congressional districts must be secured. In June, 1863, an invasion of Maryland afforded a plausible reason for declaring martial law on the Western Shore, and although the invaders were speedily driven beyond the State, the proclamation was continued in force. Consequently three of the Western Shore congressional districts were uncontested, and the Administration was enabled to use nearly all the soldiers in the State upon the Eastern Shore to secure the election, in the stead of Mr. Crisfield, of another gentleman who it believed could be depended upon to support its extreme measures.

Speaking of this election, the Boston Commonwealth, which was, if I mistake not, regarded as the organ of the outspoken, scholarly, and eloquent Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, used this language:

We do not find fault with the machinery used to carry Maryland and Delaware. Having nearly lost control of the House by its blunders in the conduct of the war from March, 1861, to the fall of 1862, the Administration owed it to the country to recover that control somehow. To recover it regularly was impossible, so irregularity had to be resorted to. Popular institutions will not suffer, for the copperhead element will have a much larger number of members in both branches than it is entitled to by its popular vote. Ohio, with its nine thousand republican majority, will be represented by five republicans and a dozen or more copperheads. It is fitting that this misrepresentation of popular sentiment in the great State of the West should be offset, if necessary, by a loyal delegation from Maryland and Delaware, won even at the expense of military interference. If laws are silent amid the clank of arms we must take care that the aggregate public opinion of the country obtains recognition somehow or other.

The will of the people as expressed at the polls, and as it would have been declared by the electoral colleges if they had been constituted in accordance with that expressed will, was at the close of the last presidential contest reversed by the fraudulent contrivances of certain southern returning boards, and victory thus turned into defeat. The fact that by the use of the Army in 1863 the national House of Representatives was organized in a manner that would have been impossible but for such use, and that there have been attempts since the war in some of the States to influence the result of elections by its use, has determined the democratic party that the law shall be so altered that the Army can never be used by the national Administration for the purpose of forcing at the polls a result which it may desire. This is the "true inwardness" of the determination of the democratic party to repeal at this time that provision of the act of 1865 which enables the General Government to interfere with the freedom of elections in the State upon the specious pretext of preserving "the peace at the polls." I have, perhaps, no right to inquire into the motives which actuate Senators upon the other side of this Chamber; but it would be interesting to know whether the desire to have the Army so used is the "true inwardness" of their determination to spare no effort to prevent the repeal of the present law.

The last observation which I quoted from Governor Bradford's message, that "if men interested in accomplishing certain political results can by any influence enlist in their behalf such a tremendous instrument of power as was here employed, (that is to say, the influence of the Army,) no election will ever probably be held in which the same means will not be again attempted," received a singular verification not long after he gave expression to it. In the latter part of October, 1866, as the general election approached, the republicans of Maryland found, in spite of the provisions of a registry law which they had framed for the express purpose of disfranchising a large portion of the citizens of the State, that the political power of the State would certainly pass into the hands of the democrats unless it could be prevented by a resort to some desperate means unknown to the law. They therefore, upon the pretext that Governor Swann was about to remove the police commissioners of Baltimore City without, as they claimed, due authority of law, attempted to bring about such a condition of excitement and lawlessness in that city as would create an apparent necessity for sending into the State the military forces of the United States, by the aid of which they had on former occasions succeeded in preventing the will of the majority of the people of Maryland from finding due expression at the polls. President Johnson referred the matter to General Grant, who, on the 24th of October, 1866, made a report to the President from which I shall read the concluding portion. I ask especial attention to these words of General Grant:

> The conviction is forced on my mind that no reason now exists for giving or promising the military aid of the Government to support the laws of Maryland. The tendency of giving such aid or promise would be to produce the very result intended to be averted. So far there seems to be merely a very bitter contest for political ascendency in the State. Military interference would be interpreted as giving aid to one of the factions, no matter how pure the intentions or how guarded and just the instructions. It is a contingency I hope never to see arise in this country while I occupy the position of General-in-Chief of the Army, to have to send troops into a State in full relations with the General Government, on the eve of an election, to preserve the peace. If insurrection does come, the law provides the method of calling out forces to suppress it. No such condition seems to exist now.
> U. S. GRANT, General.

It is an interesting inquiry whether the Senators who sit on the other side of this Chamber, and who have twice aided, since he used the language I have quoted, in electing him to the Presidency, and whose party, if general report is to be credited, in its desperation contemplates calling upon him to become for the third time a candidate for that high office, agree with him in hoping that the contingency may never arise in which troops may be sent "into a State in full relations with the General Government on the eve of an election to preserve the peace." And it is an interesting inquiry, upon which we will doubtless be fully informed before the close of the discussion upon the bill now before the Senate, whether those Senators think it would be revolutionary in us so to amend the law as to make the contingency which General Grant so earnestly deprecated impossible, except upon the application of the State Legislature, or of the executive when the Legislature is not in session and cannot be readily convened.

I have now answered the question of the Senator from Kentucky whether there was any military interference during the war with the freedom of elections in Maryland—a State the majority of whose people were at the time "sterling loyalists," as shown by the testimony already cited of her loyal governor, Augustus W. Bradford, and of the military commander, General Robert C. Schenck; and whose State government was under the absolute control of the most pronounced wing of the Union party, and whose people, even if they had desired to commit that act of folly, could not, with an immense Union army lying between them and the disaffected States, have taken any steps toward severing their relations with the General Government.

But before taking my seat I would like to say that during the period that the military were stationed in Maryland it was not upon the election days alone that they committed gross outrages upon the people and set at defiance the Constitution and laws of the United States and of the State.

I would like to ask the Senators on the other side of this Chamber whether they would like to see all freedom of speech abridged and the liberty of the press destroyed by the suppression of newspapers and the arrest and incarceration of their editors without any attempt to indict them or to bring them to trial? whether they would like to see the writ of habeas corpus contemptuously disregarded even when issued by the Chief-Justice of the United States? whether they would like to see private houses searched without oath and without warrant, and upon the vaguest suspicion? whether they would like to see the worship of the Most High forbidden unless the flag be displayed in or waving over the sacred edifice? whether they would like to see those members of a city council, whose convictions of duty will not permit them to vote for an appropriation deemed by them not to be sanctioned by the municipal charter, compelled to resign by the mild persuasion of a military "request"—which they understand to be a command coupled with a threat—and their places filled by more pliant successors chosen at an election held under military supervision? whether they would like to see the members of a State Legislature, when about to enter upon the discharge of their duties, arrested and sent to distant forts, only to be released after long incarceration without trial and without as much as being informed of the cause of their arrest? whether they would like to see an honored judge brutally beaten over the head and dragged, all covered with gore, from the seat of justice and placed in confinement, because of charging a grand jury that the Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land in time of war as in time of peace? whether they would like to see an aged minister, upon the Sabbath morn, as the church-bells are ringing out the delightful music which summons his loving congregation to listen to the gospel of the Prince of Peace which he is accustomed to proclaim from the sacred desk, arrested by a rude soldiery, despite the protest of the assembled congregation, and carried to a distant part of the State upon the vague charge that in casual conversation he has used some expression disrespectful to the Government or some of its officers? whether they would like to see a district meeting in which the members of a political party are peaceably assembled to discuss their local affairs entered by a mob of disorderly soldiers and several reputable, law-abiding citizens murdered, and when indictments are found against the murderers, whether they would like to see them spirited away by their military commander to prevent their trial and conviction?

All these and many other outrages, in the wantonness of an arbitrary, irresponsible power, were committed by the military upon the people of Maryland during the period when it was quartered in the State for the alleged purpose of keeping the peace.

I would like to ask the Senators who occupy the other side of this Chamber whether they approved of these acts when they were committed, and whether they would be willing to see them repeated by the military in the States they represent, if it should become necessary to enable them to maintain their political supremacy therein? I would like to ask them whether the use, when not demanded by the State authorities, by the General Government of the military under the pretext of keeping the peace at the polls, or under any other pretext, to interfere with the freedom of elections in the States, is not sure, if persevered in, to undermine the foundations of the Government and to prepare the way for the erection of a military despotism upon the ruins of constitutional liberty? I would like to ask them whether any political party can afford to pay such a price for a victory over its opponents? I would like to ask them whether they have forgotten the truth taught by the fable of the frogs, who having dissensions among themselves, selected the stork to be their king, but found too late that his majesty, after first eating up such of them as had opposed his accession to power, continued to indulge his luxurious tastes until the last of his subjects had become the victim of his insatiable appetite?

I say I would like to ask these questions, but I should be pained to have them answered, if, as I fear may be the case, the answers should indicate that there are some Senators upon the other side of this Chamber who are willing to risk the destruction of our form of government, who are willing to jeopardize the cause of constitutional liberty, in the hope that they may continue to hold, after the expiration of the term of the present incumbent, the possession of the executive department of the Government, and that they may regain the control of its legislative departments.

I am done, sir.

Mr. LAMAR. I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday at twelve o'clock.

Mr. WITHERS. I hope that the Senate will continue in session so that we may get through with the discussion of this bill and come to a vote upon it as speedily as practicable.

Mr. MAXEY. I design to make some remarks on the pending question, but I would prefer very much not doing so this evening. I shall be ready in the morning, if it suits the Senate to adjourn until that time. I prefer not to speak this evening.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire what the question is before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi moves that the Senate do now adjourn until Monday.

Mr. CONKLING. Hearing that motion, which as the rules declare is not debatable, I wondered on what the debate was proceeding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent.

Mr. CONKLING. I think we had better vote on the motion.

Mr. GARLAND. There were some messages sent in to-day, and I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONKLING. Which motion has precedence?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will find out.

Mr. CONKLING. Manifestly the motion to adjourn has precedence.

Mr. EATON. I move that the Senate now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn to a day certain has precedence over a motion to go into executive session.

Mr. LAMAR. I am perfectly willing to withdraw my motion in order to go into executive session.

Mr. GARLAND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut has moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EATON. I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn is withdrawn. The Senator from Arkansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WITHERS. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened; and, (at three o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.,) on motion by Mr. MCDONALD, the Senate adjourned until Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 18, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CLYMER. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. ATKINS,] who has charge of the legislative appropriation bill, I desire to move that the morning hour of to-day be dispensed with, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. It will be borne in mind by gentlemen that, this being Friday, the morning hour of to-day, if there be one, will be devoted to the consideration of bills of a private nature. There being no business of that character now ready, I submit the motion I have made.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Before that motion is submitted I desire to offer a resolution touching the organization of the House.

Mr. CLYMER. I will yield for that purpose.

SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask consent to present, only for reference to the Committee of Accounts, a resolution looking to the authorization of the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House to employ a clerk and two messengers, who are now employed and paid by provisions in appropriation bills, and who it is deemed best should be provided for by law. I simply ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee of Accounts.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ, in addition to the force in his office now authorized by law, one clerk and two messengers for the present Congress and until further order, at salaries to be fixed and determined by the Committee of Accounts; the duty of said messengers being among other things to assist in keeping order upon the floor of the House; all salaries herein mentioned to be paid monthly by the Clerk of the House out of the contingent fund.

There being no objection, the resolution was received and referred to the Committee of Accounts.

GOVERNMENT FOR INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. WADDILL. I ask consent to submit at this time for reference to the Committee on Indian Affairs a resolution of the State Legislature of Missouri, requesting her Senators and Representatives in Congress to vote for and use all means in their respective capacity to establish an efficient and suitable government in the Indian Territory.

Mr. REED. I object.

QUINCY BAY, ILLINOIS.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present at this time, for reference to the Committee on Commerce, a joint resolution, of the senate and house of representatives of the State of Illinois, purely local in its character.

Mr. HAZELTON. I object. I wish to inquire why these memorials cannot go into the petition-box the same as petitions and memorials which I have presented?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAZELTON] will withdraw his objection until the joint resolution is read.

Mr. HAZELTON. I would inquire why it cannot go through the petition-box?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I will ask that the resolution be read for information. If the gentleman then objects, he will be excused for cause.

Mr. HAZELTON. I will hear the resolution read, reserving my right to object.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas for the want of sufficient and well-improved harbors on the Mississippi River there is great annual destruction of steamboats and other water craft by the breaking up of ice and by storms on said river, involving losses of the greatest magnitude to the shipping interests of the whole Mississippi Valley; and

Whereas the Quincy Bay, of Quincy, in the State of Illinois, is one of the best natural harbors on said river, embracing as it does a body of still water more than three miles in length and of sufficient width and depth, except in a few places obstructed by sand-bars, to afford a safe and convenient shelter and harbor for vessels navigating the Mississippi River; and

Whereas, by the expenditure of a comparatively small amount of money, considering the magnitude of the shipping interests involved, in the improvement of the Quincy Bay, it would become a safe and convenient harbor for vessels navigating said river: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of representatives, (the senate concurring herein,) That the Representatives and Senators in Congress from the State of Illinois be, and they are hereby, requested to use all honorable means to secure the permanent improvement of the Quincy Bay by the Government of the United States in such a manner as to make it a safe and permanent harbor on said river.

And be it further resolved, That the secretary of state be, and is hereby, requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to each of the Representatives and Senators in Congress from the State of Illinois.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to receiving the joint resolution just read for reference?

Mr. HAZELTON. I insist upon my objection. That class of papers have always gone through the petition-box.

The SPEAKER. The Chair presumes that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SINGLETON] desires to present it in open House, in preference to putting it in the petition-box.

Mr. HAZELTON. Let it go as other papers go.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would suggest to my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. HAZELTON] that resolutions of State Legislatures have usually been permitted to be presented in open House.

The SPEAKER. They are always presented in open House on Monday. The Chair has always stated, in announcing the order of business for the morning hour of Monday, that resolutions and memorials of State and territorial Legislatures will be in order for reference and printing.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I trust there will be no objection to receiving this resolution at this time and referring it to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HAZELTON. I object to its being presented now. Let it come in on Monday.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. We have had no morning hour of Monday yet; no opportunity to present these resolutions.

Mr. HAZELTON. I object.

GEORGE T. ROGERS AND BENJAMIN P. GAINES.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask consent to submit a resolution at this time for reference to the Committee of Accounts.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Clerk of the House be, and is hereby, directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House to George T. Rogers and Benjamin P. Gaines each the sum of $180 for services rendered as clerks to the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department during the month of November, 1878.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to receiving this resolution for reference at this time?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question is first on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] to suspend the rules so as to dispense with the morning hour, which he proposes to supplement by a motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. STEPHENS. I wish to inquire of the Chair what will be the business to-day if the morning hour be maintained?

The SPEAKER. The business in the morning hour will be the call of committees for private business or reports of a private nature.

Mr. STEPHENS. We could not go on with the silver bill?

The SPEAKER. The majority of the House, finding no business of a private nature reported from committees in the morning hour, might determine to go next to the order which provides for the introduction of resolutions from States, beginning with the State of Maine.

Mr. STEPHENS. The unfinished business of yesterday could not be taken up in the morning hour to-day?

The SPEAKER. It could not. On the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to suspend the rules so as to dispense with the morning hour, a vote of two-thirds will be necessary, in accordance with the rule adopted at the beginning of the present session.

The motion was agreed to; two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLYMER. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to proceed with the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Mr. Chairman, the first movement in the programme of a restored democracy has already been accomplished so far as this House is concerned in the paralyzation of the executive force to preserve peace at the polls. The second step in the same programme is only checked by a few intervening days when the purity of the ballot-box is to be submitted to the same lawlessness, with no power in the Federal head to insure or preserve it.

The proposition offered by Mr. Southard in the closing hours of the Forty-fifth Congress, and for the most part now renewed in the extraordinary session of the present Congress, to repeal certain sections of the statutes of the United States known as the Federal election laws, is a bold and wanton attempt to wipe from the law all protection of the ballot-box and surrender its purity to the unholy hand of the hired repeater and its control to the ballot-box stuffers of the great cities of the North and the tissue-ballot party of the South.

So determined is the democratic party in the House to break down these wise and just measures, intended to secure an honest ballot to the legal voter, that they make them a rider to an important appropriation bill, making them, in the language of my colleague, [Mr. MCMAHON,] "a necessary companion to the money voted in the bill."

The repeal of these laws will remove every safeguard against fraud in the exercise of the elective franchise, and will again make possible the enormous outrages upon a pure ballot and free government which marked the elections in the city of New York and elsewhere in 1868, the wickedness and extent of which made existing law necessary and imperative. The proposition we are now considering is an open assault upon the freedom and purity of elections.

What are these laws which are to be repealed in so unusual and summary a manner? Let us briefly examine them; and, first, let me pause to refute the very general charge, so often made, that these laws interfere with State and local elections and encroach upon the rights and powers of the States. They do not apply to elections for State and local officers in any way. The States fix their own regulations, and these statutes have no force or operation upon the election machinery employed by the several States for their local elections. There is and can be no conflict between the State officers and the Federal supervisors and deputy marshals. The law applies and can only be invoked when there is an election for Representative or Delegate to Congress.

The supervisors provided for in this act are appointed in cities and towns of not less than twenty thousand inhabitants upon the written application to the United States circuit court of two citizens of said city or town, and shall be appointed in any county or parish in any congressional district upon like application to said court of ten citizens of good standing, being citizens thereof. These supervisors, it will be observed, are to be appointed by the circuit court of the United States, not by the executive power of the Government nor upon the motion of any Federal executive or office-holder, but the application comes from the people themselves; their number is limited to two for each election district or voting precinct, and they shall be of different political parties.

Their duties are prescribed in sections 2016, 2017, and 2018 of the Revised Statutes, to which I beg your attention:

SEC. 2016. The supervisors of election, so appointed, are authorized and required to attend at all times and places fixed for the registration of voters, who, being registered, would be entitled to vote for a Representative or Delegate in Congress, and to challenge any person offering to register; to attend at all times and places when the names of registered voters may be marked for challenge, and to cause such names registered as they may deem proper to be so marked; to make, when required, the lists, or either of them, provided for in section 2026, and verify the same; and upon any occasion, and at any time when in attendance upon the duty herein prescribed, to personally inspect and scrutinize such registry, and for purposes of identification to affix their signature to each page of the original list, and of each copy of any such list of registered voters, at such times, upon each day when any name may be received, entered, or registered, and in such manner as will, in their judgment, detect and expose the improper or wrongful removal therefrom, or addition thereto, of any name.

SEC. 2017. The supervisors of election are authorized and required to attend at all times and places for holding elections of Representatives or Delegates in Congress, and for counting the votes cast at such elections; to challenge any vote offered by any person whose legal qualifications the supervisors, or either of them, may doubt; to be and remain where the ballot-boxes are kept at all times after the polls are open until every vote cast at such time and place has been counted, the canvass of all votes polled wholly completed, and the proper and requisite certificates or returns made, whether the certificates or returns be required under any law of the United States, or any State, territorial, or municipal law, and to personally inspect and scrutinize, from time to time, and at all times, on the day of election, the manner in which the voting is done, and the way and method in which the poll-books, registry lists, and tallies or check-books, whether the same are required by any law of the United States, or any State, territorial, or municipal law, are kept.

SEC. 2018. To the end that each candidate for the office of Representative or Delegate in Congress may obtain the benefit of every vote for him cast, the supervisors of election are, and each of them is, required to personally scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot in their election district or voting precinct cast, whatever may be the indorsement on the ballot, or in whatever box it may have been placed or be found; to make and forward to the officer who, in accordance with the provisions of section 2025, has been designated as the chief supervisor of the judicial district in which the city or town wherein they may serve, acts, such certificates and returns of all such ballots as such officer may direct and require, and to attach to the registry list, and any and all copies thereof, and to any certificate, statement, or return, whether the same, or any part or portion thereof, be required by any law of the United States, or of any State, territorial, or municipal law, any statement touching the truth or accuracy of the registry, or the truth or fairness of the election and canvass, which the supervisors of the election, or either of them, may desire to make or attach, or which should properly and honestly be made or attached, in order that the facts may become known.

Their duties, summarized, are as follows:

First. To attend the registration of voters, who, being registered, would be entitled to vote for a Representative or Delegate to Congress

Second. To attend at the election held for a Representative or Delegate to Congress.

Third. To guard and scrutinize such elections.

Fourth. To witness, inspect, and report thereon, with the right of challenge, and the right to personally scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot, "to the end that each candidate for the office of Representative or Delegate to Congress may obtain the benefit of every vote for him cast."

Section 2022 provides that supervisors, in the absence of the marshal and deputies, or if required to assist them, shall have the same duties and powers as is conferred upon deputy marshals by this act, which includes the power of arrest and the preservation of peace.

The original purpose of the majority of this House was to repeal the entire body of the election laws, including that portion to which I have just called your attention. It is now proposed, under a more recent decree of the democratic caucus, to strike down the deputy marshals only, and wrest from the supervisors the executive powers now vested in them. This modification is not important in itself, it is no concession in the interest of an honest election, but it is highly important and valuable in another view—that of the constitutionality of the law itself. During the brief discussion in the last House the most distinguished leaders of the democratic party habitually declared the entire law, supervisors and all, wholly unconstitutional. They seem, since that time, to have read more carefully section 4 of article 1 of the Constitution, which declares—

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Which constitutional provision confers upon Congress full and adequate powers at any time to make or alter times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives, and to make or alter such regulations.

The democratic party has thus abandoned the constitutional objection by allowing the sections in relation to supervisors of elections, with some limitations, to remain. They surrender the constitutional doctrine so strenuously urged against existing law. My distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. HURD] and the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] who addressed the committee yesterday, seem not to have been present at the last caucus of their party, for their arguments are wholly based upon the constitutional question. Let me suggest to my friends that if the law is unconstitutional the courts are open to them, where that question can be judicially determined for all time; and let me remind them that this law has been on the statute-book for now seven years, and the question they make, although decided adversely to their theory by an inferior court, has never found its way to the final tribunal in such cases—the Supreme Court of the United States. To that tribunal we invite them to go. I repeat that permitting the supervisors law to stand is a giving away of all constitutional objection to the entire body of the law. It explodes the old dogma of State rights and removes all necessity for any discussion upon that point.

Enough of the law is left to recognize the principle always contended for by the republican party, that Congress had the power and that it was its plain duty to guard and protect elections where its own members were to be chosen to seats in this body; but while admitting the constitutional right, they are careful to wipe out all the provisions which give such a law practical effect in securing an honest election and preventing force and fraud at the polls. They are in favor of the law, but opposed to its execution. Now, let us briefly review what is proposed to be stricken from the law. This statute provides for the appointment of special deputy marshals; section 2021 prescribes the manner of their appointment, and section 2022 prescribes their duties. I call your attention to them at length, because their careful reading will dispose of much of the misrepresentation which has been heaped upon them in debate, and correct much of the misapprehension which prevails concerning them:

SEC. 2021. Whenever an election at which Representatives or Delegates in Congress are to be chosen is held in any city or town of twenty thousand inhabitants, or upward, the marshal for the district in which the city or town is situated shall, on the application, in writing, of at least two citizens residing in such city or town, appoint special deputy marshals, whose duty it shall be, when required thereto, to aid and assist the supervisors of election in the verification of any list of persons who may have registered or voted; to attend in each election district or voting precinct at the times and places fixed for the registration of voters, and at all times and places when and where the registration may by law be scrutinized, and the names of registered voters be marked for challenge; and also to attend, at all times for holding elections, the polls in such district or precinct.

SEC. 2022. The marshal and his general deputies, and such special deputies, shall keep the peace, and support and protect the supervisors of election in the discharge of their duties, preserve order at such places of registration and at such polls, prevent fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting thereat, or fraudulent conduct on the part of any officer of election, and immediately, either at the place of registration or polling place, or elsewhere, and either before or after registering or voting, to arrest and take into custody, with or without process, any person who commits, or attempts or offers to commit, any of the acts or offenses prohibited herein, or who commits any offense against the laws of the United States; but no person shall be arrested without process for any offense not committed in the presence of the marshal, or his general or special deputies, or either of them, or of the supervisors of election, or either of them, and for the purposes of arrest or the preservation of the peace, the supervisors of election shall, in the absence of the marshal's deputies, or if required to assist such deputies, have the same duties and powers as deputy marshals; nor shall any person, on the day of such election, be arrested without process for any offense committed on the day of registration.

As in the case of the supervisors, they have nothing to do with the elections for State and local offices and can only be appointed at an election for Representative or Delegate in Congress. They are to aid and assist the supervisors of election; to keep the peace at the polls; to preserve order and protect the supervisors in the discharge of their duties. They are to prevent fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting. What honest man can object to provisions of law looking to such important results? They are to arrest and take into custody, with or without process, any person who commits, or attempts or offers to commit, any of the acts or offenses prohibited in this act, or who commits any offense against the laws of the United States. Great exception is made to that part of the law which authorizes the marshals to arrest without process. The impression is sought to be made that this power is exceptional and without any qualification, while an examination of the law itself shows that the power is carefully limited and guarded. My colleague [Mr. HURD] falls into this error, and would leave (unintentionally I have no doubt) a wrong impression of the law. Here is the language of the gentleman, found in his speech of April 1:

The third objection is that these supervising officers are armed with authority unknown in the history of the common law or State laws. They have authority at the polls on the day of election to arrest, without warrant, any man whom they may suspect of being about to engage in a violation of the laws. There is no principle of common law or State law which can authorize the arrest of citizens on suspicion of an intention to commit an offense.

My friend has not read the law aright, as he will observe. Here is the language of the statute, "but no person shall be arrested without process, for any offense not committed in the presence of the marshal or his general or special deputies." Arrest without process can only be made upon view of the crime committed in the presence of the officer, not upon suspicion or idle rumor, not upon information, but upon actual view. There is nothing exceptional in this law. It is as old as the common law; it is the common law, as old as criminal jurisprudence; it prevails everywhere throughout the country. The lowest executive officer to the highest is authorized to arrest a person whom he sees committing a crime against the laws of the country. In some of the States this power is reposed in every citizen. It is the power vested in every police officer of the land. And why should any distinction be made between the violators of the general laws of the country and the violators of the election laws of the United States? This dangerous power, so called, is exercised by the police officers of the capital city, yes of the very Capitol itself. * The deputy marshal stands in relation to this law as the policeman to the general laws against crimes and misdemeanors, and the same necessity exists for their appointment as for the maintenance of a city police force. If crimes against the election laws are committed before his eyes, and in the immediate presence of the officer, it is his duty to arrest without warrant. What honest man will object to this? Such offenders ought to be summarily taken into custody, and the public sentiment of the country, the common law, and public morals approve and justify. It is no infringement of the constitutional liberty of the citizen. The party arrested is to be forthwith brought before the commissioner or judge for examination of the offense alleged against him. If guilty, he is held to answer by the court; if not guilty, he is summarily discharged.

This power, I admit, should be most carefully exercised and only reposed in discreet and honest hands. The appointment of deputy marshals is confined to cities of twenty thousand inhabitants or upward. They cannot be appointed in any congressional district where there is no city of that population or greater. The country districts are not immediately interested in this provision. In Ohio not more than one-fourth of the congressional districts can invoke this provision of law. In the country and smaller towns deputy marshals are not needed; here an honest election is secured by the watchful interest of a large body of fair-minded citizens. Fraud is difficult to commit where everybody is acquainted with his neighbors and where the legal voters are known to every citizen. Yet the voter in the country districts, indeed every voter throughout the land, is interested in free and honest elections everywhere, for without them his vote loses its legitimate force. An honest election in the country is of little significance if its true force is to be overcome by fraud in the large cities. Herein the interest becomes personal and immediate. In large cities the great bulk of the population are strangers to each other; few citizens know their fellow-voters, and from necessity this is the case. Fraud is easily accomplished, and is inevitable, I may say, without the most rigorous safeguards and the firm enforcement of law.

I have tried fairly to meet and answer the principal objections urged to this law. Are there any others? In the discussion had in the Forty-fifth Congress much stress was placed upon the great expense attending the execution of the law. I learn that in Cincinnati, in my own State, the expense of deputy marshals in 1878 was less than $400, and they never had a fairer, purer election than at that time. But to this, in general terms, I answer, what signifies the cost if thereby we can secure a free and fair ballot in this country? Who will count the cost if the enforcement of this law will prevent the repeaters and moonshiners from controlling the elections and subverting the popular will? For involved in this proposition is the existence of the Republic and the perpetuation of republican institutions. If honest, fair elections cannot be had, free government is a farce; it is no longer the popular will which is supreme. Free government cannot be estimated by dollars or measured by cost. We have long ago discarded that consideration. This objection has been urged many times before to the enforcement of great fundamental doctrines and principles. The same objection was urged to the prosecution of the war for the integrity of the Union and of free government. Public sentiment did not listen then to the cry of cost; it hesitated not, it faltered not then; it ignored the cost, it fought and successfully fought the great battle of freedom, and public sentiment will not now pause to count the paltry cost when free and fair elections, the foundation-stone of free government, are involved in threatened danger. If I do not misjudge, the people who fought for free government and maintained it at so great a cost will now be found firm and invincible for a free ballot and fair elections. Let me remind the other side of this Chamber that supervisors and marshals will not be needed, and therefore no cost will be incurred, whenever the party which employs tissue ballots and drives colored citizens from the polls shall do so no more forever, and whenever democratic repeaters shall cease to corrupt the ballot—the great fountain of power in this country—in a single sentence, whenever throughout this whole country, in every State thereof, citizenship is respected and the rights under it are fully and amply secured; when every citizen who is entitled to vote shall be secure in the free exercise of that right, and the ballot-box shall be protected from illegal voters, from fraud and violence, Federal supervisors of Federal elections will be neither expensive nor oppressive.

Until then, the order-loving, patriotic citizen will insist, at any cost, upon some legislative measure or measures which will the more certainly protect the citizen in his right of suffrage, which is secured to him under the Constitution and the laws.

My colleague [Mr. MCMAHON] urges another reason for the repeal of these laws. He says, in his speech in the last House:

> The marshal of the United States is the creature of the President. The special deputies are the mere creatures of the marshal. There is no law nor any general practice requiring them to be equally divided between the political parties. And if the republican marshal selects so-called democratic deputies it is to keep them quiet, or with the express or implied agreement that they will vote for or possibly openly support the republican ticket.

What will the democratic party think of this grave accusation from one of the party leaders: that for a consideration, and that, too, for an appointment as deputy marshal for a single day, democrats will break away from old party affiliations, surrender their convictions, and vote the republican ticket? Now, if this be the only objection, it can be avoided by an amendment, which the gentleman can offer at the proper time, prohibiting the appointment of any democrat as a deputy marshal, thus preventing the corruption of democratic electors. [Applause.]

Again it is urged that the presence of supervisors and marshals intimidates the democratic voter. Who ever heard of the presence of an officer of the law deterring anybody from doing what he has a legal right to do? Their presence is a restraint upon no honest voter. They prevent no citizen who is a legal voter by the laws of his State and the United States from freely and peaceably exercising that right. Their presence is his safeguard and security. They disfranchise no man. They defraud no voter of his just rights under the law. Every legal voter is made safe in the exercise of his right of suffrage. In the practical operation of this law since 1872, I have heard of but one instance of injustice, the case of Peter Coleman, cited by my distinguished friend from New York, (Mr. Hewitt,) a member of the last House, and although he alleges that four thousand arrests were made on election day in the city of New York in 1878, he finds but one victim of oppression, and his restraint and imprisonment seem to have been self-imposed. I read from his remarks:

> Fortunately for the cause of liberty, out of these four thousand citizens thus summarily deprived of their freedom, * * * one man alone, so poor that he had no friends to become his bail, and so friendless that he seems not to have known that he might have walked away, was committed to jail, and allowed to lie there until by accident his case was made known in the proper quarter, and proceedings of habeas corpus were taken to test the question of the legality of these arrests. The name of that unfortunate citizen was Peter Coleman.

How carefully and discreetly must this law have been administered when there can be found but one instance of injustice or wrong!

Has any legal voter in the United States been prevented from exercising his right of suffrage by this law, or by the officers acting under it? This is the practical question. None that I have ever heard of; while thousands, yes, tens of thousands of illegal voters have been deterred from voting by virtue of it. The honest voter has no fear of this law; it touches him as lightly as the law of larceny touches the honest man or the law of murder touches him whose hands are stainless of human blood. The thief hates the law of larceny; the murderer the law of homicide. They, too, can truthfully urge the cost of the execution of these laws; both are expensive and onerous to the tax-payer. But I have never known such argument seriously entertained as a reason for their repeal. The law is without terror save to wrong-doers. The presence of officers of the law only deters criminals from the commission of crime. They are no restraint upon the honest man. You can form no system of laws which will not be open to some criticism and abuse. These prove nothing against the importance and necessity of their maintenance. But if any better method can be offered for preserving the ballot-box in its purity, I will cordially accept it and labor for its passage, but until such better method is proposed we should stand by existing statutes.

We cannot afford to break down a single safeguard which has been thrown around the ballot-box. Every guarantee must be kept and maintained. Fair-minded people everywhere are interested in honest elections. It is not a partisan measure; it falls alike upon all political parties. The law recognizes no political creed, and those who execute it should carefully obey its letter and spirit. It protects democrats and republicans and men of all parties alike.

This House, not content with prohibiting the use of soldiers to keep the peace at the polls, forbidding their employment by the President in any emergency, however grave, now seeks to remove every remaining safeguard to a fair and honest election. The better sentiment of the country, North and South, will not submit to such unbridled license upon the ballot-box. Mr. Chairman, what will the end be? By an amendment to an Army appropriation bill which was not connected with the subject-matter thereof, peace at the polls can no longer be maintained by the Chief Executive, no matter how grave the emergency or how pressing the necessity. Tumult and riot may hold high carnival at a Federal polling place and the Federal arm is powerless to restrain it. This restriction of Federal power, this paralyzation of executive authority, ought to have satisfied the most extreme State-rights democrat; but not so. Having forbidden the use of the executive force to keep the peace at the polls, they now demand that the purity of the ballot and the freedom of the voter shall be subjected to the same lawlessness with no power in the Government to restrain it.

Mr. Chairman, my purpose thus far has been to present this law, the repeal of which is demanded, upon its merits wholly. The proposition, however, of the democratic side of the House is to offer this amendment not to the sober, independent, judgment of the House and the co-ordinate branches of the Government, but to rush it through right or wrong, justly or unjustly, as a part of a bill making appropriations for the pressing and needful wants of the Government. It is an attempt to do by force what ought to be done, if at all, in the free exercise of the law-making power by each branch of the Government acting in its proper functions under the Constitution. If force and coercion be not intended, then why not introduce and consider this legislation under the rules with deliberation and debate upon its own merits, independent and separate from an appropriation bill? This is the ordinary course of legislation, recognized by long practice, founded in wisdom, and never before abandoned for the purposes of coercion. Want of time cannot be urged in favor of this course; days of idleness have already been spent sufficient for the purpose. The resort to this method of legislation is a confession of the injustice, wrong, and weakness of the proposed measure, and evinces a determination to accomplish wrongfully that which cannot be rightfully accomplished. One of the pretexts urged in favor of placing this amendment upon an appropriation bill is that the law itself was passed by the republicans in the same way. This impression has become so general throughout the country, that it would seem necessary to state the facts in relation to the passage of the supervisors law. This law substantially as it is now in the statutes was introduced into the House, referred to the Judiciary Committee, considered by that committee, and reported back to the House by the chairman, where it was discussed, voted upon, and passed entirely independent of any appropriation bill; it took the same course in the Senate. It was not a rider to a bill appropriating money. It is true that the sections extending the supervisors to country districts and restricting their powers in such districts were passed June 10, 1872, upon the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Not to coerce the President or the Senate, not to obtain what could be obtained in no other way, for all of the branches of the Government were then in political accord.

I have not stated it as strong as the gravity of the case justifies. The proposition is to grant no money for the necessary expenses of the Government in its several departments unless the Executive will affix his signature to a bill which he may not approve. This doctrine was boldly announced by the distinguished Senator from my own State [Mr. THURMAN] in the closing hours of the Forty-fifth Congress. That I may do him no injustice, let me give you his exact language:

> But that countervailing influence, that countervailing power, was supposed to be found in the fact that all money bills must originate in the House of Representatives; that the House should hold the purse-strings, and should say, as our forefathers in England had said to the lords and king, "We will only grant supplies upon condition that grievances are redressed."
> I grant it may be an extreme measure for the House of Representatives to affix upon an appropriation bill such provisions as are contained in this bill.
> We claim the right, which the House of Commons in England established after two centuries of contest, to say that we will not grant the money of the people unless there is a redress of grievances.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] was equally pronounced.

While in the House there seemed to be but one sentiment among the democrats, which was that these laws must be repealed or the machinery of the Government must stop. Mr. Southard, who was designated by the caucus of his party to present the proposition to repeal the law relating to supervisors of elections, declared in his speech, "Let the issue come now. Not a dollar of the appropriations should be voted until this most reasonable redress of grievances is conceded." And applause from his democratic colleagues followed this revolutionary utterance. Another colleague [Mr. MCMAHON] was no less emphatic. He says:

> It is our duty to repeal these laws. It is not worth while to attempt the repeal except upon an appropriation bill. The republican Senate would not agree to, nor the republican President sign, a bill for such repeal.
> We have the power to vote money; let us annex conditions to it and insist upon the redress of grievances.

This states their position in the strongest light. He admits the repeal cannot be accomplished except upon an appropriation bill; that the republican President would not sign it; and because he will not, the proposition is to starve the Government until he does sign it. Hon. Jere N. Williams, of Alabama, and Hon. J. D. C. ATKINS, of Tennessee, Representatives from the South, speak to the same effect.

Mr. Williams says:

> An appropriation bill is a necessary medium at this time, because we can secure a repeal in no other way. Let the work go on, and let those who heed the Constitution and truly represent their States and people stand with unalterable purpose in the position that we have here taken.

Mr. ATKINS says:

> The right of the Representatives of the people to withhold supplies is as old as English liberty. History records numerous instances where the Commons, feeling that the people were oppressed by laws that the Lords would not consent to repeal by the ordinary methods of legislation, obtained redress at last by refusing appropriations unless accompanied by relief measures.

I might multiply these utterances, North and South, all showing a settled purpose upon the part of the democratic majority to have their own way in matters of legislation or they will paralyze the Government. We might well imagine we were back amid the stormy days of 1860 and '61, when this same party announced the same doctrine, evinced the same spirit, and pronounced in only another form the same threat. Restored, but not reconstructed, they are as intent upon controlling the Government absolutely, in defiance of the Constitution, and in their own way, as they were in the old days of slavery. They controlled the Executive then; thank God, they cannot do it now. [Applause on the republican side.] This mode of legislation was severely condemned by the early statesmen of both political parties, and when I have brought to your attention their recorded sentiments on this subject you will fully justify me in my characterization of this proceeding. In 1855 an attempt was made to place upon the civil and diplomatic bill certain tariff legislation, which was resisted by distinguished Senators representing both parties.

I first quote from Mr. Clayton, and read from the Congressional Globe, (in the Senate,) second session Thirty-third Congress, page 1035. Mr. Clayton said:

> Now, sir, what must be the consequence hereafter of sustaining such a proposition as the House have put into this bill? Whenever a majority in one branch of Congress shall desire any great object, which they cannot attain by a separate bill, they will move to put it on the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, and thus compel the other branch of Congress to accept the whole or none. * * * It is a most dangerous precedent; it is an example that has never been set to us before, and I hope will never be attempted again.

Mr. Bayard said:

> Mr. President, I can hardly express in language the objections which I entertain to the condition of things at which we are now arriving, resulting from the abandonment of all rules necessary for the preservation of order and the rights of the minority in reference to the legislation of the country. * * * I am not willing, by my vote, to sanction the adoption of a general system of legislation on the appropriation bills for any and every purpose that a majority may see fit to place on them.—Congressional Globe, second session Thirty-third Congress, page 1044.

Mr. Seward said:

> Mr. President, I regard the proposition to incorporate a new tariff system into the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill as one of a revolutionary character. * * * Let me state the question. The House of Representatives virtually says that if the Senate will agree that certain modifications of the tariff in regard to wool shall be made, &c., then the President and other executive officers of the Government, civil, judicial, and diplomatic, may receive their salaries secured to them by the Constitution and laws. But if the Senate will not consent to these modifications, then no officer of the Government, however high, no servant of the people, however low, shall receive any compensation.—Congressional Globe, second session Thirty-third Congress, page 1048.

Mr. Douglas said:

> I should be against this measure at the first blush, on the ground that it is not a revenue tariff; that it is not a free-trade measure; that it is a return to what I had hoped was the exploded doctrine of protection. In the next place, even if the bill were right in itself, if its provisions were correct, I could not consent by my vote to put it on this appropriation bill, for the reason that such a course is revolutionary in its character. * * * Sir, if you begin to break through those safeguards which experience and wisdom in all free governments and legislative bodies have erected, you will have opened the gates to the floods which will flow in and overwhelm your appropriation bill. * * * I say, therefore, that I cannot give my sanction to a course of proceeding so dangerous, so revolutionary in its character as this, even if I were satisfied with the character of the tariff provision which is proposed to be retained in the bill.—Congressional Globe, second session Thirty-third Congress, page 1060.

Again, in 1856 the House sought to put upon an Army appropriation bill the following proviso:

> Provided, nevertheless, That no part of the military force of the United States herein provided for shall be employed in aid of the enforcement of the enactments of the alleged Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Kansas, recently assembled at Shawnee Mission, until Congress shall have enacted either that it was or was not a valid Legislative Assembly, chosen in conformity with the organic law by the people of the said Territory: And provided, That until Congress shall have passed upon the validity of the said Legislative Assembly of Kansas it shall be the duty of the President to use the military force in said Territory to preserve the peace, suppress insurrection, repel invasion, and protect persons and property therein and upon the national highways in the State of Missouri or elsewhere from unlawful seizures and searches: And be it further provided, That the President is required to disarm the present disorganized militia of the Territory of Kansas, to recall all the United States arms therein distributed, and to prevent armed men from going into the said Territory to disturb the public peace or to aid in the enforcement or resistance of real or pretended law.—Congressional Globe, first session Thirty-fourth Congress, page 1969.

Which in the Senate led to resistance; and I extract from the discussion then had. Mr. Cass said:

> I am utterly opposed to this mode of coercion by which provisions are to be inserted in appropriation bills. * * * The effect of such a system must be that, instead of having a government with two branches in the legislature—a government composed of popular numbers and of State sovereignties, each a check on the other—you would have a government of but one branch, and it would, in fact, degenerate into a French convention. * * * You may not call it revolutionary, but it will lead to revolution.—Congressional Globe, first session Thirty-fourth Congress, page 2229.

Mr. Douglas said:

> One word upon the principle involved. I hold that the proviso of the House is not only palpably unconstitutional, but directly revolutionary.—Congressional Globe, first session Thirty-fourth Congress, page 2230.

Mr. Mason said:

> This House of Representatives, of whom I speak with all respect, have tried on more than one bill, and now, after three conferences, insist to the latest hour on making the appropriation bills the vehicle of revolutionary measures. For one, I am prepared to try it before the American people.—Congressional Globe, first session Thirty-fourth Congress, page 2230.

Mr. Cass said:

> The tendency of this principle is to concentrate all power in the House of Representatives; to allow them to annex any provision they please, without reference to the subject of appropriation. Appropriation bills are intended to be bills to carry into effect pre-existing laws; but this would be the establishment of a great fundamental unconstitutional principle, irreconcilable with the nature of our Government.—Congressional Globe, first session Thirty-fourth Congress, page 2231.

This attempt involves the overthrow of the Constitution. This is the lesson taught by the early statesmen whose warnings I have just cited. It would destroy the veto power of the President, one of the safeguards against bad legislation, one of the checks provided by the organic law.

It in effect says you dare not exercise your veto prerogative even though you do not approve of our legislation; if you do, the wheels of the Government must stop. It overrides one of the constitutional guarantees; it attempts to take away freedom of action upon the part of the Executive; it is the first step in the pathway of revolution. What are the powers of the several departments of the Government in respect to legislation? I read from section 7, article 1, of the Constitution:

Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it become a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such reconsideration two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall become a law.

And the same is true of every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary except on a question of adjournment. In the face of this provision my colleague [Mr. HURD] says "he [the President] has nothing to do with the legislation of this country." By this provision the President becomes a part of the law-making power; two-thirds of both Houses alone can override his judgment of any measure which may be proposed. This proceeding ignores the fundamental law and sets at naught the veto power except at the cost of closing up the great departments of the Government.

What does this mean? Is it too violent a presumption, is it too strong a statement to say that the party which for four years sought to destroy free government by arms are now seeking by the more peaceful but less manly methods of coercion and intimidation to control the Government which they could not destroy? If the Constitution is to be ignored, if free and honest elections cannot be had everywhere throughout the country, free government is as effectively overthrown as though it had been done by the sword. The President must surrender this power vested in him by the Constitution, which he solemnly swore to observe and obey, or the whole machinery of the Government must cease to exercise its functions. The scope and necessity of this power is discussed in the Federalist, from which I extract the following, published March 21, 1788:

It [the veto power] establishes a salutary check upon the legislative body calculated to guard the community against the effects of faction, of precipitancy, or of any impulse unfriendly to the public good, which may happen to influence a majority of that body.

* * * * * * *

The primary inducement to conferring the power in question upon the Executive is to enable him to defend himself; the secondary one is to increase the chances in favor of the community against the passing of bad laws through haste, inadvertence, or design.

* * * * * * *

The injury which may possibly be done by defeating a few good laws will be amply compensated by the advantage of preventing a number of bad ones.

* * * * * * *

It is evident that there would be greater danger of his not using his power when necessary than of his using it too often or too much.

* * * * * * *

In the case for which it is chiefly designed—that of an immediate attack upon the constitutional rights of the Executive, or in a case in which the public good was evidently and palpably sacrificed—a man of tolerable firmness would avail himself of his constitutional means of defense, and would listen to the admonitions of duty and responsibility.

* * * * * * *

It is to be hoped that it will not often happen that improper views will govern so large a proportion as two-thirds of both branches of the Legislature at the same time, and this, too, in spite of the counterpoising weight of the Executive.

This veto power was wisely provided for by the framers of the Constitution, and until now was never sought to be abrogated. It has more than once been eulogized by the democratic party of the United States. In 1856 this party, in national convention at Cincinnati, commended this power as one of the great constitutional safeguards. Let me read it:

NINTH DECLARATION.

That we are decidedly opposed to taking from the President the qualified veto power, by which he is enabled, under restrictions and responsibilities amply sufficient to guard the public interest, to suspend the passage of a bill whose merits cannot secure the approval of two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives until the judgment of the people can be obtained thereon, and which has saved the American people from the corrupt and tyrannical dominion of the Bank of the United States and from a corrupting system of general internal improvements.

The above was reaffirmed in the democratic conventions of 1860, held in Charleston and Baltimore.

It was a wise power then "to guard the public interest and suspend the passage of a bill whose merits cannot secure the approval of two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives until the judgment of the people can be obtained;" but now, in the language of my colleague, [Mr. HURD,] who announces the new doctrine of the democratic party, the right of the President to participate in legislation is denied—"he has nothing to do with the legislation of this country." This proceeding is a violation of what was once a fundamental principle of the democratic faith. Everybody knows the merits of this amendment cannot secure the approval of two-thirds of either House, much less of both Houses. That is well understood, and nothing is left in such an event, using the language of the platform, but to wait and obtain the judgment of the people, and to this tribunal we invite the democratic party in this House to go.

The gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS,] in his speech in this House on the 1st instant, declares that these questions have already been tried before the people. When and where, I ask? In what State or national platform was the repeal of the election laws demanded? In what political contest were they discussed? The issue is a new one, never tried before the people, and now for the first time pressed upon Congress by the democratic leaders as a necessity to their political campaign of 1880. In the next presidential contest there must be no safeguards to an honest ballot, no peace at the polls. Fraud and force, the great weapons of democratic ascendency, must be unrestricted. The repeal of these laws is a democratic necessity to the next presidential election.

We are willing to try before the people the question of the constitutional powers of the President, and whether the election laws, passed in the interest of a free and honest ballot, shall be maintained or repealed. The great body of voters in this country want the Constitution preserved in full force, and want and will have, sooner or later, fair play at the elections both North and South. Repeating, ballot-box stuffing, the use of tissue ballots, fraud at the polls, intimidation, and restraint of a free ballot in whatever form, must cease. The public sense abhors all these, and the party which practices such methods or quietly suffers them to be put in operation will be swept from power by the irresistible force of an honest and enlightened public sentiment. [Applause.] Who is demanding this amendment, and in whose interest? Not in the interest of free elections—the honest citizen is not demanding it; on the contrary, the general wish is for such legislation as will the more certainly and securely make the right of suffrage free and untrammeled.

Mr. Chairman, on the 2d day of December, 1878, the President of the United States in his annual message of that date called the attention of Congress to this subject and its great importance, using the following language:

The three constitutional amendments, which conferred freedom and equality of civil and political rights upon the colored people of the South, were adopted by the concurrent action of the great body of good citizens who maintained the authority of the National Government and the integrity and perpetuity of the Union at such a cost of treasure and life, as a wise and necessary embodiment in the organic law of the just results of the war. The people of the former slaveholding States accepted these results, and gave, in every practicable form, assurances that the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments, and laws passed in pursuance thereof, should in good faith be enforced rigidly and impartially, in letter and spirit, to the end that the humblest citizen, without distinction of race or color, should under them receive full and equal protection in person and property and in political rights and privileges. By these constitutional amendments, the southern section of the Union obtained a large increase of political power in Congress and in the electoral college, and the country justly expected that elections would proceed, as to the enfranchised race, upon the same circumstances of legal and constitutional freedom and protection which obtained in all the other States of the Union. The friends of law and order looked forward to the conduct of these elections as offering to the general judgment of the country an important opportunity to measure the degree in which the right of suffrage could be exercised by the colored people, and would be respected by their fellow-citizens; but a more general enjoyment of freedom of suffrage by the colored people, and a more just and generous protection of that freedom by the communities of which they form a part, were generally anticipated than the record of the elections discloses. In some of those States in which the colored people have been unable to make their opinions felt in the elections the result is mainly due to influences not easily measured or remedied by legal protection; but in the States of Louisiana and South Carolina at large, and in some particular congressional districts outside of those States, the records of the elections seem to compel the conclusion that the rights of the colored voters have been overridden and their participation in the elections not permitted to be either general or free.

I respectfully urge upon your attention that the congressional elections in every district, in a very important sense, are justly a matter of political interest and concern throughout the whole country. Each State, every political party, is entitled to the share of power which is conferred by the legal and constitutional suffrage. It is the right of every citizen possessing the qualifications prescribed by law to cast one unintimidated ballot and to have his ballot honestly counted. So long as the exercise of this power and the enjoyment of this right are common and equal, practically as well as formally, submission to the results of the suffrage will be accorded loyally and cheerfully, and all the departments of Government will feel the true vigor of the popular will thus expressed. No temporary or administrative interests of Government, however urgent or weighty, will ever displace the zeal of our people in defense of the primary rights of citizenship. They understand that the protection of liberty requires the maintenance in full vigor of the manly methods of free speech, free press, and free suffrage, and will sustain the full authority of Government to enforce the laws which are framed to preserve these inestimable rights.

This invitation by the Chief Executive to Congress to devise some means for a fair and honest election, for greater security in the right of suffrage, "that every citizen possessing the qualifications prescribed by law can cast one unintimidated ballot, and to have his ballot honestly counted," is met with no favorable response or action. No additional safeguards to the ballot-box are proposed. No increased security to the voter is extended to him, but in the face of this recommendation, and in the presence of facts upon which it is based, a democratic Congress deliberately proposes to remove all existing safeguards to a free and honest ballot.

The recommendation of the President is wholly disregarded; the fraud, force, and violence which marked some of the congressional elections in 1878, to which our attention has been called in this solemn manner, are utterly disregarded. Instead of new or additional legislation in the interest of a fair election, old legislation looking to that end is to be swept from the statute-books. The force and intimidation hitherto employed at polling places for carrying the elections are to continue without any restraint, and the same methods are to be used upon the President to coerce him to approve an amendment which will make fraud upon the elective franchise more easy of accomplishment and bulldozing beyond the power of correction.

This party in Congress, so thirsting for power, is unwilling to await the will of the people. They seek in advance of that will to usurp all governmental powers. They are endeavoring to absorb all of the constitutional functions of the President by threat and coercion. They cannot await, in their eagerness, for the voice of the people to call them to further power. I assure them that no other course will succeed. Let me suggest in all kindness, but with great plainness of speech, to the gentlemen on the other side, who so recently were engaged in the work of trying to break up this Government, that they are getting along fast enough, they already have too much power, and this is made more and still more apparent day by day as we witness the use of the power now reposed in their hands.

I have not forgotten that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] who now presides over this committee with so much ability declared a few days ago upon the floor of this House, "It is this organization [the democratic] that has come back to rule and that means to rule." That this is their purpose I have never doubted. How and in what manner let the gentleman's own words speak and I read an extract from his speech:

For the first time in eighteen years past the democracy are back in power in both branches of this Legislature, and she proposes to signalize her return to power; she proposes to celebrate her recovery of her long-lost heritage by tearing off these degrading badges.

* * * * * * *

We do not intend to stop until we have stricken the last vestige of your war measures from the statute-book.

Mr. FINLEY. Will my colleague yield for a moment?

Mr. MCKINLEY. I cannot yield.

Mr. FINLEY. I desire simply to ask the gentleman to finish the sentence he has read in part. I do not say he has garbled anything; but why does he not finish reading the sentence?

Mr. MCKINLEY. I have not garbled at all. If the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] who is now in the chair, or my colleague [Mr. FINLEY] wants the entire speech read and I can have my time extended for that purpose, I should be very glad.

Mr. FINLEY. I merely ask for the completion of the sentence.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. BLACKBURN.) If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] will permit the present occupant of the chair he will ask that the gentleman read, not the entire speech, but the sentence, instead of a part of the sentence.

Mr. MCKINLEY. What sentence is it?

The CHAIRMAN. The last one referred to by the gentleman.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Have you, sir, the whole speech? if so, I will gladly read further.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not a copy at hand.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I would not do the gentleman any injustice for the world.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will furnish a copy to the gentleman.

Mr. MCKINLEY. The gentleman from Kentucky is one of those brave, courageous men who speak the sentiments of his party and does not cover them up. [Laughter and applause on the republican side.] We know just what he means. I repeat his language:

We do not intend to stop until we have stricken the last vestige of your war measures from the statute-book.

They have already entered upon their unholy work; they are engaged in it now. Only the other day, and while the Army bill was being considered, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] one of the able and distinguished men of this House, proposed an amendment repealing section 1218 of the United States Statutes. What is the section the repeal of which he demands? Let me read it:

No person who has served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the so-called Confederate States, or of either of the States in insurrection during the late rebellion, shall be appointed to any position in the Army of the United States.

The Army list is to be opened and revised, so that men who served in the confederate army, who for four years fought to destroy this Government, shall be placed upon that list as commissioned officers. Ay, more, the men who were in our Army before the war as commissioned officers, who were educated at the public expense, who took an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and when the nation was threatened with danger resigned their commissions and forsook the flag, are to be eligible for reappointment to that Army again. Are we quite ready for this?

This is not all. On the 13th of February, 1878, the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the Forty-fifth Congress [Mr. RICE] reported to the House, with the sanction of a majority of that committee, a bill repealing section 4716 of the United States Statutes. Let me read the section to be repealed:

No money on account of pension shall be paid to any person, or to the widow, children or heirs of any deceased person, who in any manner voluntarily engaged in, or aided or abetted, the late rebellion against the authority of the United States.

And the same bill contained the following affirmative legislation:

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and required to restore to the pension-roll the names of all invalid pensioners now living who were stricken therefrom on account of disloyalty, and pay them pensions from the 25th day of December, 1868, at the rate which they would have been entitled to had they not have been dropped from the pension-roll.

These are some of the war measures which are to be "wiped out" from the statute-book. These are some of the degrading badges which are to be torn off.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, rose.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I decline to yield. The gentleman occupies this floor often enough without attempting to interrupt me.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I wish to say that is the bill which passed the republican Senate last Congress, and was approved by the President.

Mr. MCKINLEY. These are only a foretaste of the war measures which are to be wiped out and of the peace measures which are to be enacted. I am not surprised that, speaking in the same spirit, the Southern States, a newspaper published in Okolona, Mississippi, should say:

Let the Federal brigadiers take back seats in the work of restoration. The Republic has no further use for the Lincoln hirelings.

By the way, Yankees, don't it make you feel queer to think that we've defeated you fellows after all and captured the capital?

Have they "after all" captured this country? Have they "come back to rule?"

The first fruits of their dominion are not assuring to the country, and will not, I am certain, incline the people to clothe them with still greater power. Threatened revolution will not hasten it, extra sessions, useless and expensive, will not accelerate it. Threat and menace, disturbing the business interests of the country, will only retard it. It will come when your party have shown that you deserve it. When you have demonstrated that the financial, industrial, and business interests of the nation are safer and wiser in your hands than any other, and, more than all, when you have demonstrated that free government will not perish in your keeping, it will come then, and not before. I hope, Mr. Chairman, this amendment will not be insisted upon. It is wrong in itself; it endangers free government. I believe the method proposed under the circumstances I have already designated is revolutionary. There is no necessity for such haste. The law can have no force and effect until 1880, except in the State of California. If the amendment must be passed, let it come in the ordinary course of legislation. There will be ample time at the regular session next winter and before any other Federal elections will be held.

The country is not asking for it. Business will suffer and is suffering every day from the agitation of a continued extra session of Congress. Uncertainty in legislation is the terror to all business and commercial interests, and this uncertainty exists and will continue so long as we remain in session. Let us remove it. Let us pass the appropriation bills, simple and pure. Let us keep the Executive Departments in motion. Let the courts of the United States go on and clear up their already overcrowded dockets. Let the representatives of the Government abroad, upon whom our commercial relations with other nations so largely depend, be not crippled. Give the pensioners of the Government their well-earned and much-needed pensions. Let the Army be clothed, provisioned, and paid. Do this, striking out all political amendments from the appropriation bills, adjourn speedily, and give the country that peace and rest which will be promotive of the public good. When we have done this we have evidenced the wisdom of statesmen and the work of patriots. [Great applause on the republican side.] Let the people, then, the final arbiter, the source of all power, decide the issue between us.

Mr. BLACKBURN (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair) rose.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I desire——

Mr. BLACKBURN. I decline to yield if I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] has the floor.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I follow the worthy example of the gentleman from Ohio. I decline to yield.

Mr. FINLEY rose.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I decline to yield to anybody.

It seems, Mr. Chairman, that I am peculiarly unfortunate. This is not the first time that I have been forced to come from the chair of the Committee of the Whole House by reason of reflections made upon me; and, as on a former occasion, I now protest my unwillingness to engage in any discussion of the merits of the measure that is pending. I had hoped that when a member of Congress undertakes to quote from the RECORD words that he alleges have been uttered by a colleague on the floor, he would show a degree of intelligence and a degree of fairness sufficient to prevent the garbling of an official utterance. It is, sir, a pitiable instance either of the weakness of the man or the weakness of the cause, or the combined weakness of both, that prompts any man to garble and misquote the utterances of another.

The gentleman who has last occupied the floor told this committee that I had declared—and he pretended to read from the official RECORD, speaking for the party to which I belong, and of which I am the humblest mouth-piece—that we never intended to stop until we had stricken from the statute-book the last of the war measures. Mr. Chairman, that utterance was not warranted; that utterance was not true, and the RECORD shows it. But worse than that; from the chair I asked the gentleman to do me the justice to read the whole sentence, not the speech.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I ask the gentleman——

Mr. BLACKBURN. I decline to yield the floor, with all deference to the gentleman. I will speak for myself, as he refused to speak for me when I was gagged. I asked him to read the sentence which he garbled. He declined. I sent to my desk and took an official copy of that speech which he pretended to quote from; I underlined and underscored the remainder of the sentence; I wrote a marginal note on the page expressed in these very words:

Why be so unfair as garble a sentence in this fashion?

He took that, when sent to him by a page, pitched it on his desk, and refused to give me the opportunity of being heard from the RECORD. Now I will read the sentence which the gentleman declined to do me the justice before the House and the country to read:

We do not intend to stop until we have stricken the last vestige of your war measures from the statute-book, which like these—

Which, like these election laws—were born of the passions incident to civil strife and looked—to the abridgment of the liberty of the citizen.

[Applause on the democratic side.] Take that, sir. When the gentleman comes with a cut-and-dried speech to treat the country to, let him take that and gnaw it to his heart's content.

Does that embrace constitutional amendments? Is there a man in this Chamber so ignorant as to go to the statute-books of this country to hunt for a constitutional amendment? There never was a constitutional amendment borne upon the pages of a statute-book. It is above statute law; it is the organic law of this land. I accept and recognize as fully as does the gentleman from Ohio the binding force of every amendment to the Federal Constitution. [Applause on the democratic side.] I do not impeach the methods of their passage; I recognize their validity; I recognize them as to-day the organic law of the land; and I hold that man faithless to his duties of citizenship who refuses to give to them full force and effect. [Applause.]

More than that, as the language never could, even as misquoted by the gentleman from Ohio, have applied to the constitutional amendments, this sentence puts me on the record as declaring it to be the purpose of the democratic party to do nothing except to repeal the war measures that you passed for the abridgment of the liberty of the citizen. That was my declaration, and it is the only declaration that I have been justly held responsible for. It did not allude to nor reach the question of pensions to which the gentleman sought by an unfair and torturing construction to apply them. The want of candor, the want of fairness, the want of truth in the effort that has been made to put me before this House and before the country in an unfair and an improper light is my only apology for trespassing for a moment upon the patience of this committee.

Mr. HAWLEY and Mr. MCKINLEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. SPRINGER.) The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HAWLEY. I rise simply with a view to get at a correct understanding of this matter——

Mr. ELLIS. We all understand it.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. He knew very well that the gentleman from Kentucky did not mean what he attributed to him.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I desire to be heard for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. SPRINGER.) The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSE] is entitled to the floor. Does he yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MCKINLEY. I desire to say a single word of a personal character in reference to the statement made by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio rises to a personal explanation.

Mr. MCKINLEY. What I have to say is only with reference to a personal matter which seems to have occurred between the gentleman from Kentucky and myself. I wish to say I meant no discourtesy to the gentleman from Kentucky presiding over this committee; and as I think the committee will bear me out, and I am sure the reporters' notes will verify the statement I am about to make, I said distinctly in the course of my remarks that if the gentleman presiding over the committee desired me to read the whole body of his remarks, or any part thereof, not to come out of my time, if he would send me the speech, which I did not have before me, having only the simple quotation which I read, I would take pleasure in reading that to the committee.

Now it is due to me and due to the respect which I have for the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] as the presiding officer of this committee, to say that if I had observed that when the page brought his speech to me and had seen the request upon the margin thereof, I would have stopped when I got to the end of the sentence and read all that the gentleman from Kentucky has read. That was my purpose.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. Why did he not paste the whole of it on his paper when he put it on it?

Mr. MCKINLEY. I desire to say that when this paper was sent to me, as alleged, I was just about closing my speech. I said in the course of my remarks that I would read whatever the gentleman desired I should read. I make this statement, not for the purpose of modifying or taking back anything I have said, but to place myself right in the respect due to the Chairman of the committee. I do not think that the remaining clause, which the gentleman from Kentucky reads, changes at all the part I read; but I leave that question to the committee and to the judgment of the country.

Mr. SCALES. Will the gentleman, in order that this matter may be properly understood, allow the explanation given by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] to go in his own speech?

Mr. MCKINLEY. I presume the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky, with my speech, will be a part of the record of to-day, and that will bring the two statements together to enable the country to judge between the statement made by the gentleman from Kentucky and that made by myself.

Mr. HOUSE. Mr. Chairman, the scope and tenor of the remarks which I propose to submit to the Committee will make necessary at least a passing reference to the entire batch of laws sought to be repealed, to wit, the statute allowing troops to keep the peace at the polls, the test oath for jurors, and the election laws. I shall enter into no labored argument to establish the unconstitutionality of those laws, for the constitutional argument has been so clearly and so ably made by gentlemen who have preceded me, and remains so conspicuously unanswered and unrefuted, that I would feel indisposed to embark upon that line of the discussion even if I felt that I could add anything to the weight and conclusiveness of what has already been said upon that subject; but I desire to call attention to another aspect in which the laws in question may be viewed and which to my mind furnishes sound and sufficient reasons for their absolute repeal.

It should be the aim of all good government, especially of a government based on the popular will, recognizing no privileged classes, and proclaiming an equality of political rights among all its citizens, looking to the confidence and affection of the people as the firmest foundation for its stability, as the best guarantee of its perpetuity, to sanction no law which will enable those who may happen to be in power to invoke its provisions to perpetuate their ascendency and to overawe opposition to their continuance in power. No such laws can secure the willing acquiesence or command the respect of those who happen to be out of power, and who feel that they are the victims of such unfair and unequal legislation. We are told that no one can be hurt by the mere presence of troops at the polls, charged with the simple duty of keeping the peace. But if troops are allowed by law to surround the polls for this or any other purpose, it cannot be denied that a President so disposed may use them in such a manner as to confer upon the political party that elevated him to office, and to which he may look for future favors, a great advantage over his political opponents in all elections that come off in the presence or under the supervision of an armed force subject to his orders. It is no answer to this objection to assert that during the time this law has remained on the statute-book no President has ever abused it or sought to use it in his own interest or that of his party. On this point there may be a difference of opinion. But if the claim should be admitted to be just and well-founded, it would neither vindicate the wisdom of the law nor disprove the dangerous character of the power conferred. It may establish, if admitted, that we have been so fortunate during the time the law has been in force as to have Executives too patriotic and honorable to use unworthily the power placed in their hands; but there this argument for the harmless character of the law spends its force. It is silent as to the future. If this law is to remain on the statute-book, who shall give to the country a guarantee that for all future time we shall continue to have Presidents too good to abuse the dangerous power thus placed at their disposal by a confiding people? It is as much the duty of a Representative of the people to repeal a law that confers dangerous powers in advance of a positive evil arising from its abuse as it is to eliminate it from the statutes after its pernicious character has been demonstrated by hurtful results, and far wiser to do so.

I must express my astonishment that any man in this country can be found willing to advocate the propriety of conferring, in a time of peace, such a power upon the Executive. Such a law can never receive the deliberate sanction of the American people. The Anglo-Saxon race must forget all the traditions of its history and be revolutionized in all its instincts before it can cease to look with jealousy, if not abhorrence, upon a power so dangerous lodged in the hands of one man. It is impossible to reconcile our people to the existence of such a power in the hands of any President. Its liability to abuse, its antagonism to the genius of our institutions, its anti-republican and un-American character, not to mention the constitutional objection, must always prove a source of apprehension and repugnance.

It may be that our people are too sensitive and too jealous upon such questions; but they came honestly by the failing, if it be one, for they inherited it from their English ancestors. The presence of armed troops at the polls from the time of Edward I has been considered dangerous to English liberty.

The act of George II, passed in the year 1735, emphasizes the utter abhorrence with which the English mind contemplated the presence of an armed force at the polls where a free election was to be held. By that act, whenever an election of peers to represent the peers of Scotland in Parliament, or of any member of Parliament, is to be held, it is made the imperative duty of the secretary at war to order the removal of "every such regiment, troop, or company, or other number of soldiers as shall be quartered or billeted in any such city, borough, town, or place." When such election is to be held the troops are to be removed at least two miles from such voting place at least one day before the election, to remain at least two miles away from such voting place until one day after the election. And it is further provided that if the secretary at war should neglect or omit to issue such order to the troops he shall be liable to indictment, and, on conviction, shall be dismissed from office and forever rendered ineligible to hold any office, civil or military, in the realm. Armed troops, under the provisions of this act, were not only not allowed to be present at the polls as a police force to keep the peace, but, if they happened to be quartered in a city, borough, or town where an election was to be held, they were required to be removed and not even allowed to be nearer than two miles of any place where an election was to be held.

In the light of this old English statute, it sounds strangely enough to hear American statesmen in the year 1879 upon the floor of Congress defending a law which allows the President, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, to send his armed troops to the polls.

One of the charges on which George III was arraigned at the bar of the civilized world by the authors of our Declaration of Independence was that he had sought to render the military independent of and superior to the civil power. And another was that he had quartered large bodies of armed troops among the people of the colonies.

Why any people with such antecedents should be supposed to favor the law now under discussion it is difficult to see. The presence of troops at the polls to keep the peace, or for any other purpose, is an experiment that was never tried in this country until our unfortunate civil war; and the law which permitted it then found its way upon the statute-book only as a war measure. Those who on the passage of the act insisted on the presence of troops at the polls to keep the peace did not attempt to justify the dangerous and unprecedented innovation upon any other ground than that war was raging, that the life of the Union was in peril, and that therefore, as a means of self-defense, the Government had a right to place troops around the ballot-box.

Senator Howard, of Michigan, who made an elaborate adverse report on the bill introduced by Senator Powell, of Kentucky, expressly claims the right to have troops at the polls as one of the necessities of a state of war. But what was originally justified as a military power and a belligerent right alone is now claimed as a law sanctioned by the Constitution in a time of peace. What was originally justified as a military necessity only, to which the Government had a right to resort to save its life endangered by a great war, is now claimed, after the war is over and the cause and occasion for the passage of the law have long since ceased to exist, as an eminently proper provision to take its place upon the statute-book as a permanent enactment.

Mr. Chairman, the effort now made to retain in peace what was born amid the clash of arms, to legitimize by constitutional adoption this bastard offspring of licentious war, warns us of the danger of permitting what was originally only claimed and conceded as a military necessity to stand in respectable and unchallenged association with other laws upon our statute-book until it shall have become crystallized into a precedent and form the starting-point for other and more dangerous innovations.

When a great and powerful political party, with that vast influence which party organization exerts over the members that compose it, is willing to inscribe this war measure upon its banners and insist on retaining in a period of peace what was never meant to live beyond the military necessity that called it into being, it is time to settle the question whether this law shall stand or be repealed. The issue has not been made too soon, nor has it been made too late; for the doom of this measure is sealed, whether it receives its death-blow in its present struggle in Congress for existence or succeeds in postponing its fate to a decision of the people upon its merits at the ballot-box. Its unconstitutionality, its dangerous character, its manifest inequality and unfairness, all unite in the invocation for its repeal.

If a test oath is prescribed which places it in the power of one political party to monopolize the right of acting as jurors in the trial of citizens, and thereby to exclude their political opponents from being represented in the jury-box, who will deny that such a state of the law can be made a powerful engine in the interest of that party from whose ranks the jurors are to be selected? It is saying substantially to the citizens of the country, "If you do not wish to be tried by a jury of your political enemies, your interests may be subserved by changing your political opinions and party affiliations."

The right of trial by jury is among the most cherished muniments of liberty. The liberty and safety of the citizen demand that it shall remain inviolate. Our Constitution provides that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall not only have the right of trial by jury but by an "impartial jury." A test oath which virtually fills the jury-box with those of one political party, and thus confers the power upon that party to pack juries and procure political convictions, is evidently in violation of that clause of the Constitution to which I have alluded.

No party in a free State should ever be invested with such a startling power over the liberty of the citizen or be allowed to enjoy such an advantage to perpetuate its own ascendency and overawe opposition to its claims to popular approbation. If an army of deputy marshals may be appointed from one political party clothed by law with authority to arrest their political adversaries without process or without even a complaint made against them, it will not be denied by any one having any pretensions to fairness that such an extraordinary power is subversive of the liberty of the citizen and in direct violation of that clause of the Constitution which declares—

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Nor can it be denied that such a law confers upon the political party having the power to appoint these deputy marshals an immense advantage over any other party that may seek to dispute its ascendency. Can such an enactment as this remain upon the statute-books of any country of equal laws and equal privileges? Is it fair, is it just, that laws which should be made for the benefit of all should be so framed as to redound to the advantage of one political party and the detriment of the other? Arm any party in this country with the powers conferred by the laws in question, and if it does not perpetuate its power, even against the popular will, it will be because it is too honest or too timid to use the means placed at its disposal by these laws. Intrenched behind the power to surround the ballot-box with bayonets, to pack juries, to punish obnoxious citizens, to arrest ad libitum on mere suspicion, without warrant or complaint, and thus tie the hands and feet of political opponents until the polls are closed, any political party may laugh to scorn all efforts to take the fort defended by such means. Give to an ambitious or a bold partisan President the right to send the soldiers under his command to the polls; give to a compliant Federal judge the power to pack juries with the members of his own political faith; give to United States marshals the power to appoint an unlimited number of deputies with authority to arrest citizens at will against whom no complaint has been filed and no warrant issued, and what is to prevent any political party in a position to wield these great powers in its own behalf from stifling the voice of the people and perpetuating its own ascendency in defiance of the popular will?

And shall such a state of things be sanctioned by the law of the land? Can fair-minded men demand that such laws shall stand for the benefit of their party and to prevent the people, in a government based on the will of the people, from effecting a change of rulers if they so desire? Can these laws be defended on any principle of justice, of fairness, of equality, even if the Constitution should fail to raise its potential voice in solemn protest?

Political parties as such are unrecognized by our Constitution and laws. What right has one party to demand that the laws of the land shall be so framed as to confer upon them great and decided advantages in contests with any and all adversaries who may see fit to challenge their continuance in power by an appeal to the people as the arbiters to whom all such controversies must be referred?

Let it not be forgotten that we are not seeking to deprive a republican President of the power to send troops to the polls that we may confer such power upon a democratic President, but we seek simply to repeal the law and deny with equal emphasis to a democratic as to a republican President the power to surround the ballot-box with bayonets—we only ask to have our elections free from the presence of any portion of the Army, whether a democratic or a republican President may happen to be its Commander-in-Chief. We do not seek to wrest from the republican party any advantage which they may derive from the continued existence of the test oath, that we ourselves may seize the dangerous power, to prostitute our temples of justice with packed juries and political prosecutions; but to blot the law from the statute-book, so that no man in this free country shall be challenged as a juror on account of his political faith or party associations. We do not propose to deprive the republican party of the right to appoint an unlimited number of deputy marshals, clothed with unlimited powers, that we may manipulate the artfully contrived machinery of these election laws in the interest of our party; but to repeal all such unequal legislation, that the road to the ballot-box shall be obstructed by no barriers erected by the law of the land. No, sir, this is no attempt to charge the enemy's works and capture his guns that we may turn them upon him, but to spike guns that are turned not only upon us but which are trained upon the very citadel of liberty itself.

Political parties in time of high excitement and in the struggle for power may commit irregularities or even resort to fraud and violence, but we have laws for the punishment of this as well as other classes of offenders. We do not propose to subtract one atom from the force and vigor of any law that denounces such crimes nor to abate one jot or tittle of the punishment affixed thereto. But under our system of government the violators of election laws must be indicted as the violators of other laws are, and they must be tried by an impartial jury. There is no help for this. There is no near cut or by-path by which the Constitution can be flanked and the citizen seized and punished contrary to its provisions, and there ought to be none.

It may be said that if they are so indicted they will not be punished, but will be acquitted and set free. Suppose they are, what help is there for it? If gentlemen have come to the point of pronouncing our system of government a failure; of demanding that it shall be changed in its character so as to punish citizens who violate the law in some other way than by indictment or presentment and a trial by an impartial jury, let them say so, and I can understand their position. But, Mr. Chairman, as long as our Government remains one of equal rights to all citizens let our laws be equal and just; as long as we retain the ballot-box as the channel through which a free people shall express their will let our laws at least be free from the imputation of blocking the approaches to it, whatever unprincipled or violent men, contrary to law, may do in that direction. And whenever it is done in any part of the country in the interest of any political party let the law at least rise to rebuke it; but let it never be said that the law itself provides the means and gives its sanction to any impediment placed in the way of the citizen to that great repository of national power, the ballot-box, whether the impediment be in the form of armed men, deputy marshals, or any other shape that an obstruction can take.

Mr. Chairman, without going into details I have touched upon some of the more salient points against the laws which are now sought to be repealed, for the purpose of showing that the laws themselves and in themselves are obnoxious to such grave and weighty objections that a member of Congress, impelled alone by the force of his convictions as to their dangerous character, may honestly feel it to be his duty to his country to seek their repeal by all the means allowed by the legitimate methods of parliamentary proceedings. Is it so extraordinary for an American citizen to believe that such laws are in violation of the Constitution, dangerous to liberty, unfair and unequal in their effects, that his efforts to repeal them must be ascribed to a motive other than his conscientious convictions? Do these laws come before the country with such high and sacred credentials to public favor as to impeach the patriotism of any man who may see fit to oppose them? Or have we a class of men upon this floor who are nominally Representatives of the American people, but who are not allowed the privilege of forming their opinions upon the merits of all public measures and of declaring those opinions to the country without an impeachment of their motives, their patriotism, their honor as men, and their loyalty as citizens.

During the debate which took place upon the Army bill the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] in addressing himself to those who tried, to use his language, "to shoot this Government to death" during the late war, said:

> Notwithstanding your utmost efforts to destroy it, the Government was saved. Year by year since the war ended those who resisted you have come to believe that you have finally renounced your purpose to destroy and are willing to maintain the Government. In that belief you have been permitted to return to power in the two Houses.
> To-day, after eighteen years of defeat, the book of your domination is again opened, and your first act awakens every unhappy memory and threatens to destroy the confidence which your professions of patriotism inspired. You turned down a leaf of the history that recorded your last act of power in 1861, and you have now signalized your return to power by beginning a second chapter at the same page; not this time by a heroic act that declared war on the battle-field, but you say if all the legislative powers of the Government do not consent to let you tear certain laws out of the statute-book you will—not shoot our Government to death, as you tried in the first chapter—but you declare that if we do not consent against our will, if you cannot coerce an independent branch of this Government against its will, to allow you to tear from the statute-books some laws put there by the will of the people, you will starve the Government to death. [Great applause on the republican side.]
> Between death on the field and death by starvation, I do not know that the American people will see any great difference. The end, if successfully reached, would be death in either case.

Mr. Chairman, this is a grave charge, an accusation which, if true, discloses a state of affairs no less dangerous to the stability of this Government than it is dishonoring to those against whom it is made. If it is true that there are Representatives upon this floor who cherish in their hearts a hostility to the Government under which they live and which they have solemnly sworn to support so deadly that they only need the power and await the opportunity to strike the fatal blow, then indeed is this great Government reposing in fancied security upon the trembling summit of a volcano, subject at any moment to be ingulfed in one tremendous ruin. If the horoscope with which the gentleman scans the political heavens has correctly forecast the probable fate of the country, then dangers, doubts, and darkness rest upon its future. There is no security, there can be none, for anything in a government when the white-caps of threatened revolution are ever visible above the political horizon. Under its uncertain protection labor may well despair of reaping the fruits of its toil and capital hesitate to emerge from its hiding place to invigorate the industries and energies of the land. Commerce may fold her white wings and well fear to spread them upon such a sea. The artisan, the mechanic, the manufacturer, the banker, the farmer, the merchant, the day-laborer, and all who follow the avocations of a state of blessed peace, may set their houses in order and await in trembling suspense the advent of red-handed revolution and the carnival of ruin that always follows in its footsteps; for the enemies of the Government are in possession of both Houses of Congress, and from Capitol Hill, where these traitors plot their treason, their guns are trained on the White House at the other end of the Avenue. This is the picture which republican leaders have seen fit to paint of the situation at the National Capitol, and which are now being scattered broadcast among the people of the North for the purpose of inflaming passions that are fast dying out for the want of fuel to keep them burning and awakening prejudices that should be permitted to sleep in a grave above which no trumpet of resurrection should ever be sounded.

Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who do not believe that sectional hate is a national blessing. I have seen it rage with wild and reckless fury. I have seen it culminate in a war that shook the world with the thunders of its reverberations. Along the track of desolation where it has passed I search in vain for one solitary monument it has ever erected to the glory of the country. We look over this country, and along the marts of trade, in the thoroughfares of commerce, in the walks of humbler life, we can hear the cry of financial distress and behold the wrecks of broken fortunes. Everywhere the battle with bankruptcy has been fierce, a hand-to-hand conflict, and God only knows how many have gone down in the struggle or how many may yet go down before it is over. What benefit it is proposed to confer upon the country by seeking to sow distrust among the people broadcast and to repress and repel whatever indications of returning confidence may have shown themselves, I must confess I am at a loss to see.

Just before the close of the last session of Congress I heard from the distinguished gentleman from Ohio a declaration to the effect that any political party which sought to gain popular favor by an appeal to the passions and prejudices engendered by the war would find itself without followers. I heard that statement with great pleasure, both on account of the influential source from which it came and as an earnest that a kinder and more conservative feeling had become prevalent among the masses of the northern people. I little thought then that within the short space of a few weeks that gentleman himself would be the first to step to the front and make an appeal to those very prejudices and passions in the interest of his own party, and to sound a note of alarm to the country based on the assumption that those who took part in the late war on the southern side were present in the Halls of Congress as the authors or abettors of another revolution that sought the life of the Government. Mr. Chairman, it is unquestionably true that many gentlemen who drew their swords for the South in the late struggle now have the honor of seats upon this floor. But how came we here? We neither came in at the back door nor did we crawl in at the windows. We came in at the open door in broad daylight, and at the desk took an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. If we had no right to seats here, why was objection not made to our being sworn in? If we are here by the provisions of law and by the will of our constituents, why is it that we are not allowed to form our opinions upon public measures and are virtually denied the right to exercise the courage of our convictions?

Why is it, because we see fit to vote and act upon measures of public interest in opposition to the opinions of gentlemen of an opposite political faith, that our action should be ascribed to a feeling of disloyalty and hostility to the Government? It is true we have not joined the republican party; it is true that we vote for many measures which they oppose and oppose many measures which they support. Surely we have a right to do this, if we have the right to be here at all. If a Representative is denied the privilege of acting from his convictions on any and all measures that may come before the body of which he is a member, then he is in no sense a representative of the people. He is nothing more than a political prisoner in the hands of keepers who claim the right of censorship over his actions and utterances, holding in terrorism over him and over the people he is said by courtesy to represent, the wrath and indignation of the loyal people of the country if he dares to step aside from the path which has been marked out for him to tread. He was once in rebellion and what right has he to express opinions on public measures and select a course of action distasteful to those by whose sufferance he holds his seat. Have they not the undoubted right to put such manacles on his limbs as will make him harmless, and to carry in their pockets the key of the padlock that swings from his mouth?

Mr. Chairman, I am not unmindful of the fact that the republican party when they were in power passed amnesty laws removing the political disabilities of southern men who had participated in the late civil war and thus rendered them eligible to fill all positions of honor and trust to which their fellow-citizens might see fit to elect them, nor do I seek to detract from the republican party any of the honor that may belong to them for the passage of those laws.

I also admit, without mental reservation or qualification, that in accepting positions of responsibility and power after the passage of these amnesty laws we came under obligations to preserve the peace, promote the prosperity and glory of the country, and defend the honor of its flag, as high and sacred as can bind the conscience and the honor of man; and, standing here to-day in my place, as one of the humblest Representatives from my section, I challenge any man in Congress or out of it to point to the time and occasion when any Representative of the South who ever took the oath of office at that desk has proven false and recreant to that obligation. How and wherein have we been unfaithful to our plighted honor or disloyal in any respect to the Constitution and the Government of the United States? That we love our own section I will not deny. I trust I shall never reach that point of political degradation and personal infamy when I shall feel willing to turn my back on the "land where I first saw the light," or be unmindful of the welfare or the woe of her brave and generous people.

It is true we were engaged in a terrible and disastrous war in which we were unsuccessful. The causes which led to that war, the motives of the men who engaged in it on both sides, its victories and defeats, and all the vicissitudes and incidents that marked the sanguinary struggle, belong now to the domain of history. Before that august tribunal let the matter rest, and when reason shall mount her throne, when the fires of passion shall have burned themselves to ashes, the impartial historian will tell to other times and other men the true story of the great war in which their fathers were engaged. I think he will find in the valor and heroism displayed on both sides much that will not cause the children of those brave men to hang their heads in shame on account of the achievements of their ancestors. God grant that he may tell his story to a powerful, united, and prosperous country!

Sir, the restoration of the Southern States to their normal condition in the Union, the rehabilitation of their State governments, and the passage of the amnesty laws were required by the necessities of the situation. To have held the Southern States after the close of the war in perpetual vassalage as conquered provinces, to have imposed upon their people lasting disabilities, would not only have been violative of all the promises and pledges on which the war was waged, utterly subversive of our system of government and the theory of our Constitution, but would have been so destructive to the material prosperity of the country that the people, burdened with the weight of a large national debt, could not and would not have long submitted to such a state of things. It would have produced a paralysis of the productive energies of the country that would have made the situation intolerable. The methods of reconstruction, of course, contain many features which from my stand-point as a southern man I could not approve, but I am not unmindful of the difficulties that surrounded the situation. I do not wish to discuss those methods now. They belong to the past, and let the past deal with them. But in the process of time all the Southern States have taken their places in the Union with all their rights under the Constitution guaranteed to them, and their Representatives are here upon this floor. I wish to deal with the situation as it has existed since this restoration and rehabilitation. And I repeat the question: when have the Representatives from the Southern States since they were thus admitted to seats upon this floor shown themselves hostile to the Government of the United States or untrue to any duty that patriotism enjoined or any obligation that honor imposed upon them? Was it during the fierce and excited contest that raged in Congress over the count of the electoral vote in the Forty-fourth Congress?

If we are the deadly enemies of the Government which it is sought to make the northern people believe we are, why did we not rush to the front on that memorable occasion to precipitate the country into the vortex of anarchy and to launch the ship of state upon the wild and tempestuous waves of revolution? If we are here as perjured miscreants, who, having taken an oath to support the Government, are only lying in ambush to take its life, we certainly on that occasion let the most splendid opportunity to accomplish the nefarious purpose pass unimproved that may again present itself in a century. The candidate of our choice, and as we believed of the choice of a majority of the lawfully elected members of the electoral college, had certainly received a large majority of the popular vote. We then had a majority of the American people believing as we believed upon this subject. The opportunity was at hand to strike the deadly blow, and if we had been the secret enemies, the deadly foes of the Government that we are charged with being, the situation of the country might have been far different from what it is to-day. The apprehension upon the public mind on that momentous occasion was too painful to have faded from the memories of men, and when the struggle resulted in a peaceful solution of the difficulties and complications that surrounded the situation the feeling of relief was too deep to have been forgotten. The republican press of the country did not hesitate to express their warm commendation of the patriotic course of southern Representatives, and to award to them the exercise of a lofty patriotism that, rising above all mere party considerations, looked alone to the good of the country.

The Cincinnati Commercial of March 1, 1877, used this language:

> The country will remember that the peaceful adjustment of the presidential controversy is due to the moderation of the southern democratic Representatives in Congress. * * * There is (in their action) an assurance that the leaders of southern opinion are more interested in the welfare of the people than in the success of parties, and that they sincerely wish tranquillity, law, and order to prevail throughout the Union.

In a similar strain spoke the Chicago Tribune, Boston Daily Advertiser, New York Times, and other leading and influential republican journals. But all this amounts to nothing now when it suits the waning fortunes of a party in the violent convulsions of its divorce from power to make a contrary impression on the public mind. Every incautious utterance dropped from a southern man in the heat of debate, every intemperate editorial from a village newspaper however obscure and unrepresentative in character, every circumstance however trivial and unimportant, is seized upon and paraded before the country as a token of disloyalty and the nascent germ of a new revolution.

Sir, I assert here to-day that history may be searched in vain for any instance in which a brave and vanquished people, under all the circumstances that surrounded the southern people at the close of the war and that have since environed them, have more readily adjusted themselves to the altered condition of their affairs and accepted the decision of the sword on all questions that were referred to its arbitrament. What issue settled by the war is any southern man to-day seeking to revive? What national policy justified as a condition of victory or demanded by the stern logic of defeat are the southern people seeking to overturn?

Have not southern Representatives been loyal in their support of all measures necessary to the maintenance of the national faith and credit and to the support of crippled and disabled Union soldiers? We know that we have among us many wounded and disabled southern soldiers, hobbling to their humble graves on the precarious charity of an impoverished land; but the government which they fought to establish failed in its struggle for independence, and they therefore have no government to stretch forth its paternal hand to relieve their wants or lighten the burden of their declining years.

We do not complain of this as either unreasonable or unjust. It is one of the results of the war which we accept without a murmur and have abided by without repining. Nor do we complain of the policy which pays millions annually in the way of pensions to disabled Union soldiers, although we contribute our proportion of the taxes to the fund out of which they are paid. We recognize it as the duty of the Government to take care of the brave men who were disabled in its service, a duty that all governments owe to their maimed and wounded defenders.

In what, then, have we offended? In what respect have we been false to our professions or shown ourselves the enemies of the United States Government since we furled our flag, surrendered our arms, and the smoke of battle floated from the field of Appomattox? When the South, exhausted in resources and weary of war, stacked her arms, her representative men and the masses of her people bade an eternal farewell to all schemes of establishing an independent government, and at once turned their thoughts to the cultivation of peaceful relations with the United States Government and a restoration of their Commonwealths to their former positions in the Union. They accepted defeat as a finality of all their efforts to establish an independent government; and even while the swords they surrendered were still warm with recent fight, they showed every manifestation that men could give not only of their willingness but of their anxiety to resume in the utmost good faith all the duties, responsibilities, and obligations of American citizens under the Constitution and Government of the United States.

After the close of the war, as all will remember, President Johnson sent General Grant on a tour of inspection through the South, charged with the special duty of ascertaining the animus and disposition of the southern people toward the Government. General Grant, on his return, reported that he was satisfied that the mass of thinking men in the South accepted the situation in good faith, and he said further in his report:

> My observations lead me to the conclusion that the citizens of the Southern States are anxious to return to self-government within the Union as soon as possible; that while reconstructing they want and require protection from the Government; that they are in earnest in wishing to do what they think is required by the Government, not humiliating to them as citizens, and that if such a course was pointed out they would pursue it in good faith.

Commenting on this report of General Grant, in a speech which I had the honor to deliver in this House on the 18th of May, 1876, I said:

> Such was the testimony of General Grant as to the wishes and temper of the southern people in the very year of the close of the war. It was true in every particular; and I here aver upon this floor that there has never been a day or an hour since that truth was written when the southern people were not willing, ay, anxious, to do whatever they thought "the Government required, not humiliating to them as citizens." Such is the temper, such the wish of the southern people to-day. We are anxious to discharge in good faith all our duties as citizens, to contribute as far as we are able to the glory of the American name and the stability of the Government of the United States, but spare us the bitter cup of degradation and a surrender of our honor. To rob us of this would not enrich you and would make us poor indeed. Waive this demand, which manhood forbids you to make and us to yield, and the past can be buried forever. Upon this platform we can meet and shake hands over the graves of our soldiers, and under the auspices of a restored Union march on together in peace and fraternity to grander achievements than we have ever known and a future far more glorious than our past.
> Stripped of her wealth, and, I fear, growing poorer every year; crippled by the war, depressed in spirit, staggering under the weight of accumulated debt, the South looks and longs for peace as anxiously as ever the mariner looked for the star, by which he might guide his wandering bark aright, when "night and the tempest had gathered around him." If any one section of this country has a deeper interest than another in the restoration of fraternal peace and the stability of good government, the South is that section. If the northern people cannot bring themselves to the point of trusting the honor and relying on the pledges of the South, they certainly cannot be unmindful of the fact that her interest in keeping the peace is fully equaled by her inability to break it. But we have no desire to break it. If the flag that floats over this Capitol is not our flag, we have none; if this is not our country, we have none; we are aliens in the land of our birth and exiles in the homes of our childhood. Here the bones of our ancestors are buried, and here we expect our dust to sleep when our weary feet stand still upon the thorny road we have traveled. This country must be the home of our children; they will have no other home, no other country but this; here they must live, here die, and here be buried. For party purposes, our loyalty may be doubted and our names sought to be dishonored and detested, but if the time should ever come when a foreign enemy shall invade these shores and this country needs stout hearts and true to defend it, all will then see, in that hour of trial and national danger—
> Whose dripping blade and stalwart arm
> Will hew a red circle in the line,
> And fence their country's flag from harm.

Sir, I repeat to-day, with added emphasis, what I then uttered.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to revive or discuss the issues of the war. It is my purpose to confine myself to the questions of the present. No sooner had the republican minority of this House, overborne by numbers, been driven from its first intrenchment where it made a stand in the defense of a peaceful ballot, than it is again assaulted by an exultant and defiant majority, and forced to do battle in the defense of a pure ballot. Now, as then, we present upon this side of the Chamber a solid front, confident of the strength of our position and the justice of our cause, and confident also that though defeated now we shall ultimately be supported by that mighty reserve, the majority of the American people, whose invincible power no party can possibly withstand.

It will be remembered that upon the Army appropriation bill recently passed the democratic majority of this House ventured to undertake the modification of but two sections of existing law. Flushed with victory and emboldened by success, it will be observed that upon this bill they have determined not only upon the modification of four sections, but the absolute repeal of fourteen more. It is also a noticeable fact that in both instances the main force of the majority has been hurled against the election laws, laws which have for their purpose only the maintenance of the sanctity of the ballot-box.

I have neither the time nor the disposition to enter into a general discussion of the character of the provisions of those laws sought to be repealed. Their nature and purpose are well known to the House and to the country; but I cannot refrain from observing that if gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber are really anxious to preserve the peace and purity of the ballot-box, why attempt to tear down the only remaining national fortress reared for the defense of either? Do you desire, gentlemen, an honest registration? These laws provide for it. Do you want a pure ballot? They promote it. Do you want a fair count? They insure it. Do you desire a true return? They enjoin it. Do you want order and peace at the polls? They command it. Do you want repeaters and ballot-box stuffers, thugs and red-shirts punished? They secure it. And there is nothing in these laws that is a terror to any man except him who has already committed or is now meditating some outrage upon the ballot-box of the country.

You declare that you want a pure and peaceable election; and while you have been unsparing in your denunciation of all means employed by the Federal Government to insure it, not one word of rebuke, not a word of regret even has fallen from the lips of any man on that side of the Chamber for the outrages perpetrated at the polls in the South, especially in Louisiana and in South Carolina, not six months ago; in South Carolina, where you carried the elections by a system of frauds and ballot-box stuffing unparalleled in the history of nations; in Louisiana by driving voters from the polls, seizing ballot-boxes through the instrumentality of armed ruffians, destroying ballots, driving men into exile, and invoking that system of murder and intimidation so long in vogue in the South, and which has been so efficient in crushing an entire race. Let me read a word from the report of a Senate committee touching the question of elections in Louisiana in the fall of 1878. I read from the report of the Teller committee:

> The examination of the committee, it will be seen, was confined to but seven of the fifty-two parishes of Louisiana. In these seven parishes the evidence shows there were murdered "for political purposes," during the campaign of 1878, twenty-three persons. Besides these there were fully as many others murdered, whose names the committee were unable to ascertain, whose corpses were seen, by witnesses who testified before the committee, hanging on trees or lying dead in the streets or fields. Dozens more were wounded from shots fired at them with murderous intent, some of whom were present as witnesses before the committee exhibiting their scars; others were whipped, or beaten, and mutilated; wives were tied up by the thumbs and whipped for refusing to tell where their husbands were secreted; scores of leaders in politics among the colored men were driven from their homes, leaving their crops in the field and their families unprovided for. In brief, a literal "reign of terror" existed, and in fact still exists, over a considerable portion of Louisiana as the result of the policy adopted by the democracy for perpetuating its rule in that State.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURROWS. Not now. When I read such a history and remember how you have overcome majorities in the south and stamped out a party in blood, and made free speech and a free press, free homes, free emigration, and a free ballot impossible within many portions of the Southern States, I must confess that I listen with impatience to the hypocritical cant about peace, protection, and purity at the polls. [Applause.] This very hour while you are professing such jealous care for the rights of American citizens, a whole race is fleeing from your presence as they would fly from a pestilence. Not to escape Federal bayonets, but southern bludgeons; not to escape Federal bullets, but southern bowie-knives; not to escape Federal interference, but southern intimidation; not to escape Federal force, but southern fraud; not to escape election laws, but enforced exile; not to escape from Federal marshals, but from southern murders; not from honest registration, but from masked raiders; not from supervisors of election laws, but from southern shot-guns. In a word, fleeing from a people and country where their every right is cloven down and their every wrong unredressed. When I hear gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber denounce these outrages upon a free ballot and free men in many portions of the Southern States, it will be time for me to believe that they are really sincere and solicitous for the protection of the citizen and the purity of the ballot-box. Pardon me if I express my honest convictions.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the gentleman yield now to a question?

Mr. BURROWS. I cannot. Pardon me, I say, if I express my honest convictions that with all your professions you want neither peace nor purity at the polls. Your chiefest desire is the election of a democratic President in 1880. By what means you little care. You want these laws repealed because they stand in the way of the consummation of such a purpose, for you know full well, and the country knows, that if they are permitted to stand, and can be enforced, and every man in this Republic, North and South, allowed to vote as his conscience dictates, without injury or fear of injury to life or property, you could no more elect your President in 1880 than you are honestly entitled to your majority in either House of this Congress to-day. [Applause on the republican side.]

But I did not rise to address myself so much to the character of the election laws and the necessity for their continued existence as to the method and means by which their repeal is sought to be consummated. The country, Mr. Chairman, is to-day alarmed, and justly so, not for the safety of these laws, but for the security of the Government itself. They are alarmed at the oft-repeated declaration of the democratic majority in this Congress, that they propose to wipe from the statute-books all the legislation of the last eighteen years, which is regarded as offensive to the democratic party, and to enter upon that work now by starving the Government into submission. This threatened revolution has overshadowed all other questions and has become the main issue of the hour. The question now is not whether we may have any army to keep the peace at the polls, but whether we shall have an army at all. It is not a question whether the Navy may be used for this or that purpose, but whether its deck shall be wholly abandoned and our men-of-war lie with stripped sails rotting on our shores. It is not so much a question whether the President of the United States has the constitutional power to place troops within the limits of a State as whether the executive department shall be permitted to exist at all unless supporting itself by private resources or public charity. It is not so much a question whether the judiciary of the country would hold the election laws constitutional as whether we shall have a judiciary at all unless it shall consent to surrender its judgment on constitutional law to the dominant party in Congress and drag its unsullied ermine through the slough of a democratic caucus. It is not so much a question whether Congress had the constitutional power to pass these laws as whether we shall have a Congress at all. It is not so much a question which one of the three great and co-ordinate branches of the Government has power to direct the use of the Army and Navy as it is whether there shall any longer be three branches or only one, and that this democratic House, holding sovereignty and unquestioned sway, at whose feet executive and judiciary alike shall kneel with uncovered head and like cringing mendicants plead for bread. In a word, the issue this democratic Congress presents is simply this: to the minority in both Houses, "Yield your judgment to ours;" to the President of the United States, "Sign the bills we present;" to the judiciary, "Echo our views of the Constitution, permit us to load appropriation bills with political riders until we have effected the repeal of all laws offensive to a democratic caucus, or we will withhold all supplies for the support of the Government, throw the machinery out of gear, and hold it there until we starve you into submission." These are the questions of the hour, and if this be not revolution, in the name of Heaven what is it?

It has been stated that your conduct in 1861 was honorable and heroic, meaning I suppose as contrasted with what is now proposed, but I am prepared to characterize the rebellion of 1861 as treason, and your purposes of to-day but little else, and, so far as the South is concerned, an exhibition of the basest ingratitude. Is it fitting for you to smite the hand that fed you and sting the breast that warmed you back to life? Have I exaggerated your purpose?

Let me recount a brief but startling history. On the 4th day of March just passed the President of the United States, by public proclamation, informed the country that the Forty-fifth Congress had closed its deliberations "without making"—and I quote the language of the proclamation—"the usual and necessary appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and without making the usual and necessary appropriations for the support of the Army for the same fiscal year."

Every statement in that proclamation is literally true. That Congress did adjourn without making the slightest provision for the support of the legislative, executive, or judicial branches of the Government, and without appropriating one single dollar for the support of the Army of the United States. That same Congress knew, the moment it adjourned, that if no further legislation was had until the time for the regular session of this Congress in December next it was inevitable that in less than four months from the hour of its adjournment the three great pillars that sustain and support the Federal fabric would, unless supported by the omnipotent arm of a patriotic people, crumble and fall, while the Army, disbanded by starvation, would not be suffered to survive the dissolution that it might even stand guard over the sacred ruins.

That same Congress knew the moment it adjourned that if matters were undisturbed, that if the country now would comply with what Jefferson Davis demanded in 1861, "Just let us alone," the rising sun of July 1, 1879, would gild, not the temple, but the tomb of the Republic. Had there been no Executive to disturb this plot the nation to-day would be tottering to its dissolution. Yet, thanks to the President of the United States, thanks to his patriotism and his courage, it is made possible for us to avert so dire a calamity.

Sir, by the same proclamation, a portion of which I have already read, both Houses of the present Congress were convened in extra session on the 18th of March for the simple and single purpose of making provision for the support of the Army and the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government, a work so simple that it might have been consummated in one week, and the session closed. But what have we witnessed? For more than ten days both Houses of this Congress, now under democratic control, went through the idle ceremony of meeting and adjourning from day to-day. For what? Awaiting the pleasure of a democratic caucus which, if rumor is to be credited, was considering, not how the needed supplies for the support of the Government might best be provided, but how rather they might be withheld, and the very necessities of the Government, which we were summoned to relieve, seized upon and made available to prosecute and sustain a siege already inaugurated, until the Executive should be forced to surrender to the domination of Congress. The democratic majority of this Congress began just where the democratic House of the last left off.

Why did the Army bill and the general legislative bill fail in the last Congress? Was it because there was any serious or irreconcilable difference of opinion between the House and Senate on any item of appropriation? I understand not. Not that. But these bills failed solely because the then democratic House insisted upon ingrafting upon these appropriation bills measures of a political character known to be offensive to the republican Senate, then saying to the Senate in spirit if not in words, "Consent to the obnoxious legislation or no supplies will be voted for the support of the Government."

And now what is attempted? Why, sir, it is no longer necessary to coerce a Senate, for both branches are now under the undisturbed control of the democratic party. But an executive is to be overcome, and the very same measures which were then used to coerce a Senate are now invoked to coerce the President. Am I mistaken in that? If you do not mean coercion, divest this bill of its offensive political legislation, and I venture the assertion that it will pass this House to-day without one dissenting voice from this side of the Chamber; will as quickly receive the sanction of the majority of the Senate, and within forty-eight hours become a law by executive approval. If you do not mean coercion, separate these measures and let each stand or fall upon its own merits. First feed the Army and supply the means for the support of the Government, and then consider your political legislation. Do this, and I think I hazard nothing in saying that there will not be the slightest objection on this side of the Chamber to the introduction and immediate consideration of any bill embodying this or any other legislation you may see fit to enter upon touching the use of the Army or the modification of the election laws.

Do I hear consent to this proposition from the other side? Oh, no. The siege is to be prosecuted without mercy and with no terms of capitulation but unconditional surrender. In a word, your avowed purpose is this: to ingraft upon any and all of the appropriation bills any measure of general legislation which a democratic caucus shall have previously approved, and then pass these bills with such legislation attached; and if the President, in the exercise of his constitutional power of veto, shall return these bills to this House with his objections thereto, and we of the minority shall not in sufficient numbers surrender our judgment to constitute the requisite two-thirds to overcome such veto, then you will withhold all supplies for the support of the Government and adjourn this session of Congress; and if again summoned by the President, you will repeat the folly and persist in the crime until the President or the minority of Congress is starved into submission, or until the Executive and congressional terms shall have expired by limitation of law. Have I overdrawn your designs? Have I exaggerated your intentions?

When the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] now before me, in opening the debate on the Army appropriation bill, charged the democratic majority of this House with such revolutionary purpose the evidence in support of the accusation was in a large measure circumstantial, but nevertheless of sufficient weight to carry conviction to the minds of the most incredulous. Time, which reveals the purposes of men, has dispelled all doubt and to-day there is no question of your purpose; to-day you stand arraigned before the country at the bar of public judgment, on your own plea of guilty, self-convicted conspirators against the life of the nation. [Applause.]

Bear with me while I read some of your voluntary confessions of guilt. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HURD,] in his speech of April 2, said:

It is objected to these measures of legislation which we propose that there is a possibility by our passing these laws of restraining the veto power of the President; or, as my distinguished friend from Ohio put it the other day, of "interfering with his participation in the legislation." I deny that the President of the United States has any right to participate in the legislation of this country.

Mr. MULDROW, of Mississippi, in his speech of April 3, said:

If the gentleman from Ohio is correct in his assumption that the President will veto these repeals, then, I repeat, let the responsibility be upon him and the republican party. If there is revolution in that they are the revolutionists; they are the party and he is the officer whose veto will thwart the will of the people as expressed by their representatives in Congress, and he will for partisan purposes exercise a constitutional prerogative in the interest of tyranny and in violation of every principle of liberty and freedom.

Mr. ARMFIELD, of North Carolina, in his speech of April 3, said:

The President shall veto no law passed by Congress except for one of two reasons: first, that it is unconstitutional; second, that it is hasty or inconsiderate.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, declared in a speech on April 4:

For myself, President or no President, veto or no veto, I am prepared to fight upon this line until the work proposed is done, effectually done, whatever of time, labor, or expense it may involve.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky, in a speech made April 4, said:

Well, sir, if Mr. Hayes vetoes this bill on account of the sixth section guarding the right of suffrage, then the responsibility will rest on his shoulders, and not on ours, for starving the Army. I do not believe Mr. Hayes will veto the bill on account of the sixth section. But if he does, and persists in that veto, and thereby starves the Army of the United States, then let the responsibility rest where it belongs, on the head of the President, for vetoing a bill, right, proper, and constitutional, passed by a majority of the representatives of the people in the exercise of their constitutional rights.

The distinguished gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. KITCHIN, in a speech on April 3, said:

The honorable gentleman need not remind this House of the evil results that might flow from the anticipated act of the President; it will neither drive nor lead from an honest and faithful discharge of duty; we will perform our duty to the country and let them assume the responsibility of defeating the will of the majority and, if you please, as they say, destroying the Government. I plant myself on this rock and say, in the language of the valiant Fitz-James:

Come one, come all, this rock shall fly
From its firm base as soon as I.

The gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. O'CONNOR, said:

We have been thus early convoked here by the President to furnish supplies to run the Government, just as we were prepared to do in the last Congress until impeded and opposed by the Senate. The Representatives of the people, who are the sovereigns of this country and hold the purse, do not intend to be coerced. It is our province and our prerogative, it is our duty, to see before we give the taxes of the people that all grievances are redressed.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] said in his speech on April 2:

Sir, it is said that the Army shall eat nothing because the republican party in its arrogance refuses to eat humble pie. You threaten to starve the Government to death because you have grown so great that you cannot even do what is right if it happens to be demanded by the majority of an opposite party.

Now, I do not believe that the Government is going to die; but if it should die from the issue now presented, upon whose shoulders will the responsibility rest?

* * * * * * *

Andrew Johnson on that trying occasion set an example to his republican friends which they would do well to remember now. Rather than see the wheels of this Government stopped he signed that bill; but he signed it under protest, and thus made his appeal to the country.

If it is deemed necessary to make another appeal to the people on the question now at issue, the republican President can make his choice—he can either follow the example of Andrew Johnson, or he can, as the gentleman from Ohio said, destroy this Government without firing a single hostile gun. It is for him, not for us, to say which course he will choose.

* * * * * * *

If free government must die, and die at the hands of such a President as this, then the democratic party can look in the face of the expiring goddess of liberty and say:

Shake not thy gory locks at me,
Thou canst not say I did it.

Mr. MCMAHON, of Ohio, in his speech of March 29, said:

I believe that we have made up our minds fully to take all the consequences before the people of an adherence to our views. If the President of the United States prefers to "starve the Government" * * * with him will rest the responsibility.

The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPARKS,] who had the Army bill in charge, said:

I deny, therefore, that the President has any legislative power. He has the power to arrest; only the power to arrest. Now let us take the case before us. It is insisted that the President is attempted to be coerced by the proposed legislation and that this action is revolutionary. Now, sir, we pass a law. All appropriations of money from the Treasury must be made by law. We pass this law appropriating nearly $27,000,000. In that law we make provision that the Army, for which the appropriation is made, shall not be used "to keep the peace at the polls" in the various precincts and polling places throughout the United States. The President chooses, if you please, to arrest it. He says: "I arrest this law and return it to the Congress with my objection." What do we do? I do not know what gentlemen generally will do; but my idea in this particular case would be to say to the President, "Very well, sir; if you do not need this law, why should we want it? We certainly have the constitutional power to let it alone, and, Mr. President, as you have chosen to arrest it by your positive act of objection or veto, all right; now just let the subject drop." But then he will say, "But, gentlemen, that will not do; this law must be passed; I must have this law." "Well, then," we answer, "why did you not take it, sir, and make it effective after we had passed it and presented it to you?" "Because," he says, "it had some provision in it that was objectionable to me." "Well, sir, what do you propose to do?" "Why, I propose that you shall pass a law unobjectionable to me; in other words, you shall pass the kind of law that I want you to pass."

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] in his speech of April said:

I tell you, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, the Army dies on the 30th day of June unless we resuscitate it by legislation. And what is the question here on this bill? Will you resuscitate the Army after the 30th of June with the power to use it as keepers of the polls? That is the question. It is not a question of repeal. It is a question of re-enactment. If you do not appropriate this money, there will be no Army after the 30th of June to be used at the polls. The only way to secure an Army at the polls is to appropriate the money. Will you appropriate the money for the Army in order that they may be used at the polls? We say no, a thousand times no.

* * * * * * *

The gentlemen on the other side say there must be no coercion. Of whom? Of the President? But what right has the President to coerce us? There may be coercion one way or the other. He demands an unconditional supply. We say we will give him no supply but upon conditions.

* * * * * * *

When, therefore, vicious laws have fastened themselves upon the statute-book which imperil the liberty of the people, this House is bound to say it will appropriate no money to give effect to such laws until and except upon condition that they are repealed. [Applause on the democratic side.]

* * * * * * *

We will give him the Army on the single condition that it shall never be used or be present at the polls when an election is held for members of this House, or in any presidential election, or in any State or municipal election.

* * * * * * *

Clothed thus with unquestioned power, bound by clear duty, to expunge these vicious laws from the statute-book, following a constitutional method sanctioned by venerable precedents in English history, we feel that we have the undoubted right, and are beyond cavil in the right, in declaring that with our grant of supply there must be a cessation of these grievances, and we make these appropriations conditioned on securing a free ballot and fair juries for our citizens.

The distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] in his speech of April 4, said:

May I not assure that gentleman and his associates that the dominant party of this Congress, the ruling element of this body, is also equally determined that until their just demands are satisfied, * * * this side of the Chamber, which has demonstrated its power, never means to yield or surrender until this Congress shall have died by virtue of its limitation. [Applause on the democratic side.] We will not yield. A principle cannot be compromised. It may be surrendered; but that can only be done by its advocates giving proof to the world that they are cravens and cowards, lacking the courage of their own conviction. We cannot yield, and will not surrender.

* * * * * * *

Now, sir, the issue is laid down, the gage of battle is delivered. Lift it when you please; we are willing to appeal to that sovereign arbiter that the gentleman so handsomely lauded, the American people, to decide between us.

* * * * * * *

I do not mean to issue a threat. * * * But I do mean to say that it is my deliberate conviction that there is not to be found in this majority a single man who will ever consent to abandon one jot or tittle of the faith that is in him. He cannot surrender if he would. I beg you to believe he will not be coerced by threats nor intimidated by parade of power. He must stand upon his conviction and there we will all stand. He who dallies is a dastard, and he who doubts is damned. [Great applause on the democratic side.]

At the close of the Forty-fifth Congress, Senator THURMAN, of Ohio, said:

We claim the right * * * to say that we will not grant the money of the people unless there is a redress of grievances.

The distinguished Senator from Kentucky, Mr. BECK, in the last Congress, said:

They seemed further to agree, and I agreed with them, that if an extra session must be called, much as it is to be regretted, the very moment it is called the committees of both Houses would be organized and separate bills would be framed and passed as soon as possible asking the President of the United States to agree with the representatives of the States and people.

* * * * * * *

We insist that those matters pertain solely to the States and are part of their absolute right. * * * When these three laws are submitted to the President for his approval, as they will be, and are approved by him * * * the next Congress will in my opinion be ready to pass every appropriation bill. * * * If, however, the President of the United States, in the exercise of the power vested in him, should see fit to veto the bills thus presented to him, which I repeat will simply be to keep soldiers from the polls, to allow proper jurors to serve who will try cases honestly, and allow the States to control their own election, then I have no doubt those same amendments will be again made part of the appropriation bills, and it will be for the President to determine whether he will block the wheels of government and refuse to accept necessary appropriations rather than allow the representatives of the people to repeal odious laws which they regard as subversive of their rights and privileges. * * * Whether that course is right or wrong, it will be adopted, and I have no doubt adhered to, no matter what happens with the appropriation bills.

Such, gentlemen, are your voluntary confessions. Are they not sufficient to dispel all doubt from the public mind that it is your deliberate, premeditated, unalterable, and wicked purpose to starve this Government to death if the Executive shall dare to use his constitutional power to arrest legislation which his judgment cannot approve? And what do you urge in extenuation of this crime? What have you to say why the judgment of the country should not now be pronounced? From one I hear a feeble response that the President, in exercising his veto power, is resisting the will of the majority in Congress, and therefore his wishes should be disregarded.

Did it ever occur to the constitutional lawyers upon the other side of this Chamber that the veto power of the President is always exercised against the will of the majority of both Houses of Congress; that until a measure shall have passed Congress the President is powerless to veto? I have been unable to find a single instance where any President ever vetoed a measure that had not passed Congress. [Laughter.] To say, then, that the veto shall not be used against the will of the majority is to say that it shall not be exercised at all.

Another responds, We are not responsible for the death of the Government; we vote supplies and the President declines them; and with him and the minority rests the responsibility. Such a plea is a compound—pardon the expression—of idiocy and insolence seldom equaled, never excelled. It deserves no answer. As well might the merciless jailer place before a famishing prisoner food mixed with poison and then say to him: Eat or refuse; the responsibility of your life rests entirely with you.

To the many other pleas interposed, that the President has no part in legislation, that he is a sort of chief clerk to a democratic Congress, I shall only reply in the language of two distinguished democratic Presidents. I refer to the messages of Franklin Pierce and James K. Polk upon the veto power of the President.

In the fourth annual message of President Polk, sent to Congress December 5, 1848, I find the following:

The Constitution provides that "every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve, he shall sign it, but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their journal, and proceed to reconsider it."

The preservation of the Constitution from infraction is the President's highest duty. He is bound to discharge that duty, at whatever hazard of incurring the displeasure of those who may differ with him in opinion. He is bound to discharge it, as well by his obligations to the people who have clothed him with his exalted trust as by his oath of office, which he may not disregard. Nor are the obligations of the President in any degree lessened by the prevalence of views different from his own in one or both Houses of Congress. It is not alone hasty and inconsiderate legislation that he is required to check; but if at any time Congress shall, after apparently full deliberation, resolve on measures which he deems subversive of the Constitution, or of the vital interests of the country, it is his solemn duty to stand in the breach and resist them. The President is bound to approve, or disapprove, every bill which passes Congress and is presented to him for his signature. The Constitution makes this his duty, and he cannot escape it if he would. He has no election. In deciding upon any bill presented to him, he must exercise his own best judgment. If he cannot approve, the Constitution commands him to return the bill to the House in which it originated, with his objections.

Any attempt to coerce the President to yield his sanction to measures which he cannot approve, would be a violation of the spirit of the Constitution, palpable and flagrant; and, if successful, would break down the independence of the executive department and make the President, elected by the people and clothed by the Constitution with power to defend their rights, the mere instrument of a majority of Congress. A surrender on his part of the powers with which the Constitution has invested his office, would effect a practical alteration of that instrument, without resorting to the prescribed process of amendment.

With the motives and considerations which may induce Congress to pass any bill the President can have nothing to do. He must presume them to be as pure as his own, and look only to the practical effect of their measures when compared with the Constitution or the public good.

But it has been urged by those who object to the exercise of this undoubted constitutional power, that it assails the representative principle and the capacity of the people to govern themselves; that there is greater safety in a numerous representative body than in the single Executive created by the Constitution, and that the executive veto is a "one-man power," despotic in its character.

That the majority should govern is a general principle, controverted by none; but they must govern according to the Constitution, and not according to an undefined and unrestrained discretion, whereby they may oppress the minority. The people of the United States are not blind to the fact that they may be temporarily misled, and that their representatives, legislative and executive, may be mistaken or influenced in their action by improper motives. They have, therefore, interposed between themselves and the laws which may be passed by their public agents various representations, such as assemblies, senates, and governors in their several States, a House of Representatives, a Senate, and a President of the United States. The people can by their own direct agency make no law; nor can the House of Representatives, immediately elected by them; nor can the Senate; nor can both together without the concurrence of the President, or a vote of two-thirds of both Houses.

The people, by the Constitution, have commanded the President as much as they have commanded the legislative branch of the Government to execute their will. They have said to him in the Constitution, which they require he shall take a solemn oath to support, that if Congress pass any bill which he cannot approve "he shall return it to the House in which it originated, with his objections." In withholding from it his approval and signature he is executing the will of the people, constitutionally expressed, as much as the Congress that passed it. No bill is presumed to be in accordance with the popular will until it shall have passed through all the branches of the Government required by the Constitution to make it a law. A bill which passes the House of Representatives may be rejected by the Senate; and so a bill passed by the Senate may be rejected by the House. In each case the respective Houses exercise the veto power on the other.

Congress, and each House of Congress, hold, under the Constitution, a check upon the President, and he, by the power of the qualified veto, a check upon Congress. When the President recommends measures to Congress he avows, in the most solemn form, his opinions, gives his voice in their favor, and pledges himself in advance to approve them if passed by Congress. If he acts without due consideration or has been influenced by improper or corrupt motives, or if from any other cause Congress or either House of Congress shall differ with him in opinion, they exercise their veto upon his recommendations and reject them; and there is no appeal from their decision but to the people at the ballot-box. These are proper checks upon the Executive wisely interposed by the Constitution. None will be found to object to them or to wish them repealed. It is equally important that the constitutional checks of the executive upon the legislative branch shall be preserved.

If it be said that the Representatives in the popular branch of Congress are chosen directly by the people, it is answered, the people elect the President. If both Houses represent the States and the people, so does the President. The President represents in the executive department the whole people of the United States, as each member of the legislative department represents portions of them.

* * * * * * *

In the exercise of the power of the veto the President is responsible not only to an enlightened public opinion but to the people of the whole Union who elected him, as the representatives in the legislative branches who differ with him in opinion are responsible to the people of particular States or districts who compose their respective constituencies. To deny to the President the exercise of this power would be to repeal that provision of the Constitution which confers it upon him. To charge that its exercise unduly controls the legislative will is to complain of the Constitution itself.

If the principle insisted on be sound, * * * we must remodel our whole system, strike down and abolish not only the salutary checks lodged in the executive branch, but must strike out and abolish those lodged in the Senate also, and thus practically invest the whole power of the Government in the majority of a single assembly—a majority uncontrolled and absolute, and which may become despotic. To conform to this doctrine of the rights of majorities to rule, independent of the checks and limitations of the Constitution, we must revolutionize our whole system. We must destroy the constitutional compact by which the several States agreed to form a Federal Union and rush into consolidation, which must end in monarchy or despotism. No one advocates such a proposition; and yet the doctrine maintained, if carried out, must lead to this result.

* * * * * * *

If he [the President] surrender this power [of the veto] or fail to exercise it in a case where he cannot approve, it would make his formal approval a mere mockery, and would be itself a violation of the Constitution.

* * * * * * *

The executive, legislative, and judicial, each constitutes a separate co-ordinate department of the Government, and each is independent of the others. In the performance of their respective duties under the Constitution neither can, in its legitimate action, control the others. They each act upon their several responsibilities in their respective spheres; but if the doctrines now maintained be correct, the executive must become practically subordinate to the legislative, and the judiciary must become subordinate to both the legislative and the executive; and thus the whole power of the Government would be merged in a single department. Whenever, if ever, this shall occur, our glorious system of well-regulated self-government will crumble into ruins, to be succeeded first by anarchy, and finally by monarchy or despotism.

President Pierce in his message vetoing the French spoliation bill, sent to Congress February 17, 1855, said:

It is not incumbent on the President to sign a bill as a matter of course, and thus merely to authenticate the action of Congress, for he must exercise intelligent judgment or be faithless to the trust reposed in him. If he approve a bill, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objection, to that House in which it shall have originated for such further action as the Constitution demands, which is its enactment, if at all, not by a bare numerical majority, as in the first instance, but by a constitutional majority of two-thirds of both Houses.

While the Constitution thus confers on the legislative bodies the complete power of legislation in all cases, it proceeds, in the spirit of justice, to provide for the protection of the responsibility of the President. It does not compel him to affix the signature of approval to any bill unless it actually have his approbation; for, while it requires him to sign if he approve, it, in my judgment, imposes upon him the duty of witholding his signature if he do not approve. In the execution of his official duty in this respect he is not to perform a mere mechanical part, but is to decide and act according to conscientious convictions of the rightfulness or the wrongfulness of the proposed law. * * * The President's responsibility is to the whole people of the United States as that of a Senator is to the people of a particular State, that of a Representative to the people of a State or district. * * * When, however, he entertains a decisive and fixed conclusion, not merely of the unconstitutionality but of the impropriety or injustice in other respects of any measure, if he declare that he approves he is false to his oath and he deliberately disregards his constitutional obligations.

In the light of this democratic authority let me say to the democratic party on the other side of the Chamber that you cannot possibly stand upon the position you have taken; it is wholly untenable; it is revolutionary and revolting to the better sentiment of the American people; and because it is so we propose to resist it now and here, as in the Army appropriation bill, to the extent of our power. For if we yield now, when and where, tell me, are we to make a stand? Let no gentleman upon this side of the Chamber indulge the delusion that if this point is surrendered there will be no further advance on the part of the enemy! Sir, this is the beginning of a series of assaults to be followed up and pushed with relentless vigor until every fortress reared for the defense of free men and a free ballot—for peace and purity at the polls; for national life and individual liberty—shall be torn down and demolished, that lawless violence, fraud, and murder may run riot in the land.

Should we yield now, how long will it be before upon an appropriation bill for the support of the Post-Office Department a provision will be incorporated excluding from the southern mails, as was done in times of the slave power, all printed matter tending to instruct the colored people in their political rights and responsibilities; and then say to the President, "Sign, or no mails?"

How long before upon an appropriation bill for the support of the judiciary will a provision be incorporated making an appropriation for the payment of slaves and the Supreme Court menaced with starvation to extort from it a decision that the constitutional prohibition was never constitutionally adopted? "Mr. President, sign, or no court."

How long before upon some appropriation bill a provision will be attached submitting an amendment to the Constitution abolishing the three great constitutional amendments? "Mr. President, sign, or no support."

How long before a provision will be incorporated upon some appropriation bill for the re-establishment of slavery? "Mr. President, sign, or your Government stops." How long before upon some appropriation bill a provision will be made for the payment of the cotton tax, and the interest thereon, and the liquidation of all southern claims? "Mr. President, sign, or starve." How long before upon a bill granting pensions to Union soldiers a provision will be incorporated for pensioning confederate soldiers also? Even now you cannot pension the survivors of the Mexican war without including Jefferson Davis. "Mr. President, sign, or no pensions for Union soldiers." And so the work might go on, through the instrumentality of appropriation bills, of undoing the entire legislation of eighteen years, as has been threatened; until the last vestige of those laws for the protection of human liberty and individual rights shall have been swept away.

A word more and I have done. The distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] the acknowledged leader of at least the southern wing of the democratic party of this House, took occasion to say in his recent speech in this Hall that "this side of the Chamber," alluding to the democratic majority, "never means to yield or surrender until this Congress"—mark the word, not this session or the next, but until "this Congress—shall have died by virtue of its limitation." I have given his exact words. That event cannot happen until the 4th of March, 1881.

And so the order is promulgated from the Federal Capitol, in the face of this nation, by an ex-confederate soldier, to prosecute the siege until this Republic, which he and his co-conspirators could not destroy by the sword, shall be reduced by starvation. And no sooner is the order given than the whole democratic party, North and South, leap into the trenches at the rallying cry of their chosen leader, "He who dallies is a dastard, and he who doubts is damned." Thus is the siege begun, thus is it prosecuted. And with an air of defiance, smacking a little of southern domination, we are told that "the issue is laid down, the gage of battle is delivered; lift it when you please." Be it so, and be this my answer: that it is our supremest pleasure to lift it now and here, [applause on the republican side;] and we are prepared to make good the appeal. [Renewed applause.]

Sir, we accept the challenge you now present in no spirit of boastful arrogance, but with an unflinching purpose and a sublime courage, awaiting the issue with the utmost confidence and composure. It is not the first time we have encountered a solid South conspiring against the life of the Republic; and although your forces may be somewhat augmented by your northern allies, yet I see nothing in the increased array to cause a heart to faint or a cheek to blanch. [Applause.] As you failed then you will fail now. As you could not kill, you cannot starve. Did it ever occur to you, gentlemen, that although you should withhold all supplies for the support of the Government that possibly it might yet survive? Did it ever occur to you that although you should protract this siege until this Congress shall have died by virtue of its limitation, that possibly there would be no necessity for surrender? Withhold support from the Executive; are you quite sure there will be no President? Refuse to feed the Army; are you entirely certain there will be no troops? Deny to your Navy the means to keep it afloat; are you certain you will force it to anchor? Withhold support from the judiciary; is it clear there will be no courts? Refuse the needed supplies for maintaining the legislative branch of the Government; are you confident there will be no Congress? Why, sir, you are as impotent to overthrow the Government by starvation as you were to annihilate it by the sword. You may distress, but you cannot destroy. [Applause.] For, let me tell you, when that time comes the same loyal people from the same loyal States who took their lives in their hands and went forth to do battle for the life of the republic, enduring the weary march, the protracted siege, the smoking hell of battle and the more horrible hell of Southern prison-pens, until from the dark waves of rebellion they bore upon broken arm and lacerated breast the bleeding form of the republic and planted her feet upon the immutable rock of constitutional government and civil liberty—I say from the same States thirty millions of people, animated by the same patriotism, will, when you attempt to starve this Republic, fly to her side at the first cry of her distress, and there they will stand in ceaseless vigil, not with a sword, but with sustenance; not with the implements of war, but with unmeasured wealth; not with shotted cannon, but with unlocked coffers; not with bandages, but with bounty; and, bending over her prostrate form, will they succor and sustain her, ministering to her necessities, until, in the fullness of time, they can wrench from her throat the cowardly hands that clutch it; and then, thrilled with a new life, will she spring to her feet, and the very altar you builded for her immolation shall become a throne upon which she shall stand, in the majesty of her power, resceptered and recrowned, goddess of nations. [Long continued applause.]

Mr. COFFROTH obtained the floor.

Mr. GIBSON. The gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. BURROWS] quoted to this House certain testimony taken during last winter before the Teller committee in the city of New Orleans, in which certain charges were made against the citizens of Louisiana. I desire simply to say that those citizens were arrested upon the charges then made against them; they were conveyed four hundred or five hundred miles from their homes to the city of New Orleans; they were tried before juries to which the test oath was applied; they were tried before judges who formerly were in sympathy with the republican party, and they were fully and honorably acquitted. That, sir, is the answer I propose to make to the gentleman so far as his charges relate to the citizens of Louisiana.

Mr. BURROWS. I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether he denies the statement I have made.

Mr. GIBSON. I do deny it.

Mr. BURROWS. What portion of it?

Mr. GIBSON. I deny it to be true. I do not deny it is a part of the report; but I say that citizens were arrested upon those charges, and acquitted.

Mr. BURROWS. Upon what charges?

Mr. GIBSON. Upon similar charges to those by the deputy marshals and supervisors of Louisiana.

Mr. BURROWS. You are referring to that portion of the report which says they were not punished?

Mr. GIBSON. I say that they were tried and acquitted.

Mr. BURROWS. Who were?

Mr. GIBSON. These citizens.

Mr. BURROWS. That is an easy trick down there. [Laughter and applause on the republican side.]

Mr. GIBSON. If this was a "trick" it was a "trick" by the men who could take the iron-clad oath. It was a "trick" performed in the presence of judges who were republicans. It was a "trick" by the very men whom the gentleman now invokes to conduct the elections in those States—deputy marshals, supervisors, judges, and men put upon the jury-boxes who could take the iron-clad oath, swearing to the fact that they had never had any sympathy with the southern people in the late war. The iron-clad oath was administered to those jurors. I should like to know now why it is that a republican should speak in this legislative assembly in such disrespectful language of the judiciary of the United States. Has that judiciary, Mr. Chairman, fallen so low, has it already become so degraded, have the United States district attorneys lost their character to such an extent, are the men who could take the iron-clad oath so little entitled to the regard of this body and to the respect of the republican member who has just taken his seat, as to be called "tricksters?"

And, sir, when citizens have been taken from their homes, carried four or five hundred miles to the city of New Orleans and tried in the most solemn manner under the forms of the Constitution and laws of our country, is that a "trick?" Sir, I had hoped, although the gentleman may employ his declamation against the men who were enlisted in the cause of the South, although he may please his constituency, perhaps, by calling us conspirators, and the democratic party in this House our co-conspirators, I say I had hoped a decent respect for his own party, if not for the amenities of this House, if not for the Constitution, [laughter on the republican side,] if not for the united people of this country, would have led him to abstain from assailing the judiciary of the country and calling them "tricksters." [Applause on the democratic side of the House.]

Mr. BURROWS rose.

Mr. COFFROTH. I believe I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to let the gentleman from Michigan say a word.

Mr. BURROWS. There is certainly no propriety, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. COFFROTH. I do not object if it is the wish of the House that the gentleman should proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that it will not come out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. GARFIELD. It will not be taken from the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, there is no occasion for the warmth exhibited by the distinguished gentleman, for I only read the report of a committee showing that intimidation and murder had been permitted in Louisiana during the last election. I made no accusation against the courts or any officers of the courts. I simply declared what the report of the committee showed, that in Louisiana there had not been a fair and free election. It is a notorious fact that in many of the districts of Louisiana there was not a free or peaceable election. I have in mind one district now in particular, in which Caddo parish is located, a district extending thirty-five or forty miles. There the ballot-box was placed at the northern extremity of that parish, and men were compelled to make a journey of twenty miles and back again in order to cast their votes. It is a notorious fact that three hundred black men made that march and deposited their ballots; and it is equally notorious that after they had deposited their ballots an armed band of ruffians seized that ballot-box, broke it to pieces, and destroyed the ballots. And no man can deny it, for it is supported by abundant evidence. It is also admitted, and cannot be denied, that in another parish that usually casts a heavy republican vote, not one solitary republican vote was polled, and why? Because you drove the leaders of the republican party from that county, serving upon them notice to leave, and they are in exile today.

Mr. ELAM. Let me interrupt the gentleman one moment.

Mr. BURROWS. Not now.

Mr. ELAM. That is the parish of Natchitoches.

Mr. BURROWS. Yes, Natchitoches.

Mr. ELAM. That is the parish where these people were acquitted.

Mr. GIBSON. Yes, sir; where they were acquitted of that very charge.

Mr. BURROWS. I wish to say one word further.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. FRYE. The Chair said this was by unanimous consent, and did not come out of the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BURROWS. It is a notorious fact that witnesses were subpœnaed——

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. The man who said the democratic party was a band of conspirators and sought to overturn this Government is not entitled to any courtesy from that party or from this House. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. BURROWS. I appeal to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize nobody until order is restored. In common fairness the Chair cannot do less than recognize the right of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to claim the floor when he chooses.

Mr. BURROWS. I wish to finish the sentence which I commenced before I was intimidated by my distinguished friend on the other side. [Laughter.] I wish to say it is a notorious fact that witnesses subpœnaed to appear before the United States courts to testify in regard to these outrages were taken from the boat on their way to New Orleans at an unusual landing place and there surrendered to a band of armed men without hats or shoes, but masked, and the whereabouts of these witnesses has never been known from that day to this.

Mr. ELAM. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COFFROTH] give me five minutes?

Mr. COFFROTH. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. ELAM. During the canvass in 1876 and before, I had always used what influence I had in Northern Louisiana to prevent violence and intimidation; and I have never heard that it was charged that there was ever any fraud there. I know whereof I speak. On the day of the last election I was not in Shreveport or at any other polling place, because I was down with wounds I had received by being thrown from a carriage.

As to the Natchitoches case, where the republican party charged that Blount and some of his followers were driven out of the parish in order that they might not organize the republican party and carry the parish——

Mr. BRIGHT. I rise to a question of order. There is too much confusion and interruption.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is well taken. The committee will come to order.

Mr. ELAM. In that case all or most of the leading men of the parish were indicted by a United States grand jury. Both the judges of the circuit court and the district court are republicans. The iron-clad oath was administered wherever the republican district attorney desired it; because you remember that under the eight hundred and twenty-first section of the Revised Statutes that official has the right to insist upon it. The jury was impanneled; the case was tried by men who could take the iron-clad oath and did take the iron-clad oath; and these gentlemen were acquitted. And with regard to a very considerable number of those prisoners, the judge, a republican judge, said there was no evidence on which they could have been convicted.

Mr. REED. What had become of the evidence?

Mr. ELAM. The evidence?

Mr. REED. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELAM. It was all before the court.

Mr. STONE. What of the evidence taken off the steamboat?

Mr. ELAM. Oh, I heard all about that after I came to Washington.

Mr. DUNNELL. I object to these interruptions of the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. ELAM. It is very easy to prove anything you want to about a thing of this kind. It is not only so there, but everywhere else in this country; and I deplore it as much as any man.

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed to the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. COFFROTH. Mr. Chairman, trial by jury is defined by the renowned English commentator on common law to be the bulwark of English liberty. An honest and fair election, where the elector can deposit his ballot untrammeled and unawed, is the palladium of American liberty.

In the early history of our country the great object of our fathers was to establish a free government for the people, and that the people in the exercise of the elective franchise should be unrestrained. The arraignment of George III had been tried by battle, and his despotic power was lifted from the necks of our people. When we contemplate the long struggle for freedom we can readily conceive how anxious and determined were the framers of the Constitution to protect the ballot from either military or civil interference by the Federal Government. The teaching of all our statesmen from the earliest history of our country down until the republican party came into power is an unbroken declaration that the Federal power has no authority to interfere in the elections, but that each State of the Union should regulate the qualifications of the voter and control the manner of holding its elections.

As the democratic party is once more in power in both branches of Congress, the people expect, yea demand, of it that it shall wipe from the statute-books all laws that are unwise, unjust, and obnoxious, and that in any degree trammel the voter in exercising the rights of a freeman. The ballot is the weapon which the freeman uses to protect his personal liberty, his civil rights, his property, and to perpetuate to himself and children the blessings of good government. It is the ballot that—

> Executes a freeman's will,
> As lightning does the will of God.

Mr. Chairman, during this discussion and the discussion on the Army bill I have been wonderfully surprised at our republican brethren on the other side of this Chamber. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] sounded the war tocsin and furiously waved the "bloody shirt" and the whole camp danced to it. After hearing their loud and bitter denunciation of the democrats and their howling cry of revolution and of "starving the nation to death," I ventured to look across this Chamber and I was delighted to see that our republican friends were not actually enraged, but in fact they were as peaceable and pleasant in appearance as a May morning. There they stood or sat with their faces beaming with joy and apparently saying to the "brigadier-generals" of the South "Come to us, come help us, though your 'sins be like scarlet,' we will open our arms wide and fold you to our hearts and make you the highest in our synagogue, provided, dear southern brethren, you will be republicans and help us to keep the democrats, who deceived you during the war, out of power."

Now, sir, if the voters of the country had been present to hear and see—in the language of my distinguished colleague, [Mr. KELLEY,] "how thoroughly Pickwickian is the cry of revolution"—they would be satisfied that this acrimonious debate as it appears in the newspapers is only intended to arouse bitter feelings for no purpose under the heavens than to keep the republican party in power. Have we not heard enough said about the late war, and the miseries incident thereto? Has our country not suffered enough? The President of the United States, the choice of the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber, has clasped the endearing hand of friendship "across the bloody chasm." He took into his Cabinet a confederate soldier, one, to use the language of the other side, "whose hands were yet reeking with the blood of Union men." And I appeal to our republican friends if he has not made a good officer, and if they are not happy over his appointment? Has not this same President appointed other distinguished confederate or rebel generals to high places of trust, emolument, and honor? Again, this same President, in his southern trip, made good conciliatory Union speeches. He described the men north and south who were in the war as "Greek meeting Greek," and accounted for the victories achieved by the Union armies on the ground that there were more northern than southern Greeks.

Again this republican President respected the will of the people in the States of South Carolina and Louisiana. He recognized and sustained the men who had been elected by the people and gave these States good governments to the dismay and discomfiture of the "carpet-baggers" and republican plunderers who had been kept in office by the strong arm of the military power of the Government by his republican predecessors. By these utterances and acts the President has discarded the issues and bitterness of the late war.

The cry of revolution and starving the nation to death is a mere trick by which our political opponents expect to alarm the timid, frighten the weak, and unite the broken and scattered fragments of the republican party. Who wants to starve the nation? Can any sensible man be made to believe that the democratic party desires to starve the nation? That grand old party that has ever been the guardian of the Constitution and the liberty of the citizens has a noble and honorable future before it. Its aim is the prosperity of the nation; its object is to protect every citizen in a free exercise of all the rights given him by the Constitution and the laws to build up our ruined commerce, manufactures, and business interests.

Mr. Chairman, I propose to discuss the Army bill as well as the bill under consideration. In the Army appropriation bill it is proposed to strike from the first section of the act of the 25th of February, 1865, the words "or to keep the peace at the polls." This section, as amended, will then read:

No military or naval officer or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States.

Now, sir, the words "or to keep the peace at the polls" are stricken out to prevent military interference at the elections. So that for no pretended reason of keeping the peace can the military power be used to control elections and coerce and deprive the voter of the free exercise of his right to vote. The fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution declares that the United States "shall protect each State against invasion, and on application of the Legislature or of the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence." The act of Congress of February 28, 1795, provides:

In case of an insurrection in any State against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the executive when the Legislature cannot be convened, to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States which may be applied for, as he deems sufficient to suppress such insurrection, or on like application to employ for the same purpose such part of the land or naval forces of the United States as he deems necessary.

The power conferred upon the President by the Constitution and the act of 1795, to use and direct the military forces of the Government, was the law of the nation until the passage of the act of 1861, which was passed as a war measure and which was perverted by the war power so as to use soldiers at the polls for every purpose. Under the construction placed upon the law of 1861, the military were stationed around and about the polls on the most frivolous pretexts, in order to intimidate and coerce the voter. The law of 1861 did not provide for any penalty for the improper use of troops at the polls. The act of the 25th of February, 1865, passed the Senate on the 2d of June, 1864. Senator Powell, of Kentucky, amended the first section of the act so as to read:

No military or naval officer or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States.

Mr. Pomeroy, of Kansas, moved to amend the section by adding to it, "or to keep the peace at the polls." To this amendment Mr. Powell objected, and said "it would destroy the effect of the bill. The State authorities can keep peace at the polls."

Mr. Saulsbury, of Delaware, said:

That is the very pretext on which these outrages were committed in my State, and it is the very same pretext that will be put forward again.

Mr. McDougall, of California, said:

I am one of those who were taught to think that the weapon of the ballot in the hands of a free citizen is a better weapon than steel of the finest temper. That point of instruction in my youth has become the faith of my maturer years. The ballot, the free ballot, the uncontrolled ballot is the only power possessed by a free people which enables them to overawe those in authority. Arbitrary power is most expressed by the presence of armed men, and I would not have them where the citizen was exercising this high privilege.

The amendment "or to keep the peace at the polls" was adopted by a vote of yeas 16, nays 15. Every vote in the affirmative was cast by republican Senators and all the democrats who voted cast their votes against the amendment. After the bill was amended all the democrats who voted on the bill voted for the amended bill. They voted for it because of the second section, which provides for the punishment of the improper use of the troops at the polls. The second section is as follows:

That any officer or person in the military or naval service of the United States who shall order or advise, or who shall directly or indirectly by force, threat, menace, intimidation, or otherwise, prevent or attempt to prevent any qualified voter of any State of the United States of America from exercising the right of suffrage at any general or special election in any State of the United States * * * shall be liable to indictment for a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall pay a fine of not exceeding $5,000 and suffer imprisonment in the penitentiary not exceeding five years, at the discretion of the court trying the same; and any person convicted as aforesaid shall, moreover, be disqualified from holding any office of honor, profit, or trust under the Government of the United States.

Before the bill came into the House for its action the election of 1864 had been held. The bill was reported from the Judiciary Committee of the House on the 22d day of February, 1865, and on its final passage all the democratic members of the House who voted on the bill voted for it. I was among the number.

Mr. Chairman, I voted for the bill because by the authority of the "war power" exercised by the then Administration armed soldiers were stationed at the polls. In at least two of the counties of the district I had the honor then to represent on this floor deputy provost-marshals and squads of soldiers surrounded the polls at the election in 1864; they coerced, intimidated, and arrested voters. At one of the polls in Bedford County, I am informed, a peaceable farmer protested against armed soldiers being present, and for asserting a right he had under the laws of our State he was brutally murdered by some of the soldiers after the polls closed. I was opposed then, as I am now, to the amendment, "or to keep the peace at the polls," adopted by the Senate, but the force of circumstances then induced me to vote for the bill. What I could not then get I gladly accept now.

Sir, England has guarded her ballot-box from military interference. Colonel Pipori's Official Manual of English Military Law contains the following order:

In order that the freedom of the election of members to serve in Parliament may not be influenced by the military, it is enacted by the tenth and eleventh Victoria, chapter 21, that on every day appointed for the nomination or for the election, or for taking the poll for the election, of a member to serve in Parliament, no soldier within two miles of the city, borough, or place where the nomination or election is to be declared or poll taken, shall be allowed to go out of the barracks or quarters in which he is stationed, unless for the purpose of mounting or relieving guard or of giving his vote at such election; and that every soldier allowed to go out for any such purpose within the limits aforesaid, shall return to his barracks or quarters with all convenient speed as soon as his guard shall have relieved or vote tendered.

When I turn to the statutes of my own State—the "keystone to the Federal arch"—I find the following law on this subject, approved the 2d day of July, 1839:

No body of troops in the Army of the United States, or of this Commonwealth, shall be present, either armed or unarmed, at any place of election within this Commonwealth during the time of such election: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed so as to prevent any officer or soldier from exercising the right of suffrage in the election district to which he may belong, if otherwise qualified according to law.

Mr. Chairman, in 1871, at an election held in Philadelphia a company of marines from the navy-yard was marched around the various polling places. Governor Geary, a brave and distinguished general in the late war and an ardent republican, in his message to the Legislature commented on this species of military intimidation as follows:

The employment of the United States troops at elections without the consent of the local and State governments has recently received considerable attention and reprehension. It is regarded as an interference with the sovereign rights of the States which was not contemplated by the founders of the General Government, and if persisted in must lead to results disastrous to peace and harmony. The practice is one so serious in its character and so injurious in its tendencies as to merit prompt consideration and decisive action, not only by the General Assembly but by Congress. One of the complaints of the colonists against the British King was the oppression growing out of the assumption of this power. They said "He has kept among us in times of peace standing armies without the consent of our Legislatures;" and, what is especially pertinent to the case in point, "He has affected to render the military independent of and superior to the civil power."

The perpetuity of our free institutions as well as the prosperity of the country demands that the military shall be subordinate to the civil power, and the right of an unawed ballot be guaranteed to every elector in the nation.

Mr. Chairman, I now turn to the bill under discussion. In it we propose to repeal certain statutes regulating supervisors of election and the appointing of deputy marshals.

First. The judges of the United States circuit court at the instance of any two citizens of any town or city having upward of twenty thousand inhabitants, or at the instance of any ten citizens in any county or parish, may appoint two citizens resident of the city, town, or voting precinct, being of different political parties, who shall be designated as supervisors of election. These supervisors are required to attend at all times and places fixed for the registration of voters who are entitled to vote for a Representative or Delegate in Congress, to challenge any votes supposed to be improperly offered, to remain with the ballot-box after the voting is over, until the votes are entirely counted, and after the votes are counted out and tabulated to certify their correctness or append objections, and do and perform other acts and things in the premises.

Second. United States marshals are authorized to appoint deputy marshals who are authorized "either at the place of registration or polling place or elsewhere, and either before or after registering or voting, to arrest and take into custody without process any person who commits or attempts or offers to commit any of the acts or offenses prohibited herein, or who commits any offense against the laws of the United States."

Sir, it will be seen that this law authorizes the arrest of a citizen without process on the mere whim or caprice of a deputy marshal. If the most upright citizen in this great nation offers to vote, not having been registered, he is liable to be seized, taken into custody, and imprisoned by a deputy marshal. Sir, where is the boasted liberty of the citizen if he can be arrested and imprisoned without process of law? Why, sir, under the law of my State about one in twenty of all the voters at every congressional election are subject to arrest under this statute, inasmuch as about that proportion are generally not registered; yet, by the law of the State, non-registered citizens are entitled to vote by making affidavit to their residence if otherwise qualified.

The Constitution of the United States provides in article 4 that "the right of the people, to be secure in their persons against unreasonable seizures, shall not be violated; that no warrant shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation." And in article 5 it declares that no person shall be deprived of "liberty or property without due process of law."

Thus it will be seen that the power given to deputy marshals is not only dangerous to the dearest rights of the citizen, but is in violation of the Constitution of the United States.

I beg permission to read from the report of the committee appointed by the last Congress to examine into and report on the laws in regard to the appointment and pay of supervisors of election and deputy marshals:

The law was enacted professedly to aid in securing a full, free, fair, honest ballot. That it has failed has become a matter of history; for since the enactment of these sections and the exercise of power under them there has been complaint of more and greater fraud than ever existed prior to its passage.

The power to anticipate an election fraud, real or fanciful, prior to its attempted perpetration, to seize and hold to bail or put in prison a voter as a means of preventing his coming to the poll, or to deter therefrom upon suspicion, is a little more power than should be conferred upon any partisan.

The experiment to secure an honest vote, by the medium of appointees under this law, we believe has signally failed, and the powers conferred have been too often used to prevent rather than to secure an honest vote. The administration of these laws has not only been productive of no affirmative good, but has cost large sums of money without any good return.

Mr. Chairman, at the elections held in 1876 there were 4,863 supervisors and 11,610 deputy marshals, at a cost to the United States of $275,296.70. At the elections held in 1878 the number of supervisors was 4,599, and there were 4,467 deputy marshals, at a cost to the United States of the enormous sum of $202,291.69.

In New York City alone there were 1,494 supervisors and 3,565 deputy marshals in 1876, at a cost to the United States of $155,021.88. This enormous sum of money was taken from the people to hire men to corrupt the voters and pollute the ballot-box in order to carry the State of New York for the republican party. In Pennsylvania there were 1,592 supervisors and 396 deputy marshals in 1876, at a cost to the United States of $33,590. All the supervisors and deputy marshals were in Philadelphia, except 273, and the amount expended in Philadelphia to coerce the voter and keep that city republican was $30,860.

In 1878 in Pennsylvania there were 1,682 supervisors and 773 deputy marshals, at the enormous cost to the United States of $43,943. All of the deputy marshals and all of the supervisors except 312 were at Philadelphia. The sum spent in Philadelphia at this election was $40,820.

The sworn testimony of the marshal of the eastern district of Pennsylvania before the Wallace-Teller investigating committee of the United States Senate shows the most astounding fact that every one of the deputy marshals in Philadelphia was a republican. Even if they had been reputable persons, which they were not, this would be so unjust that it should meet the condemnation of every fair-minded citizen.

Now, sir, I will give a summary of part of the sworn testimony before that committee to prove the desperate and depraved character of these deputy marshals.

Detective Charles Miller, connected with the district attorney's office of that city, testified that—

He knew Philip Madden, a deputy of the Fourth ward. He was one of the worst men in Philadelphia, violent and dangerous. He has been out of prison about eight months for highway robbery. Andrew Lamvello, of the First ward, is a fugitive from justice; Dan Redding is a bad, dangerous character, and has been tried for murder; George Cornelius is of bad reputation; Michael Slater is a notorious repeater and thief; Pitts, of the Seventh ward, keeps a gambling place; he is colored, and has been arrested; Henry Scott, colored, of Lombard street, has a bad reputation; Radney F. Springfield, of the Fifteenth ward, was tried for murder and acquitted. All these men were deputy marshals to the knowledge of the detective.

Other witnesses testified to the bad and debased character of the deputy marshals; that many of them were drunk; that they insulted and maltreated the voters. From this sworn testimony, and which I am told cannot be contradicted, among the depu y marshals in the great city of Philadelphia appointed to protect the purity of the ballot-box and sustain a free and untrammeled election we find the most debased characters, highway robbers, fugitives from justice, repeaters, thieves, keepers of gambling-houses, murderers, keepers of bawdy-houses, and drunkards.

Mr. Chairman, this is an astonishing revelation. Think of it, sir! This in the city where "old independence bell" first rang out the joyous peals of liberty. Liberty of the citizen was then the thrilling cry of the patriots of the Revolution; but now, more than one hundred years thereafter, comes up a bitter and shameful complaint that the inestimable right of the citizen to a free ballot uncontrolled by military or civil Federal power is trampled under foot by a horde of debased and drunken deputy marshals.

Mr. Chairman, as a native of the great State of Pennsylvania and one of its Representatives on this floor, I enter my solemn protest against this debasing interference with the elections in my State. Pennsylvania has laws upon its statute-books which secure to every elector his right to vote.

Mr. Chairman, although these unwise and obnoxious laws are but feebly defended on this floor by the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber it is alleged by them that it is illegal and some of them even go so far as to say that it is revolutionary and destructive of the Government to "place their repeal on appropriation bills." Now, sir, is this sound logic? The bill provides for the expenses of the Army. Then, sir, as Congress has only the constitutional right to make this appropriation, it undoubtedly has the power to determine how the money shall be expended, and to prescribe by law that the Army shall not be used for political purposes, nor to interfere at elections, or be allowed to destroy civil government and erect on its ruins a military despotism.

When Congress appropriates money to maintain the judicial, legislative, and executive departments of the Government it has the constitutional right to enact in the appropriation bill that the money thus appropriated for upright purposes should not be squandered on drunken and debased deputy marshals to interfere with the rights of the citizen, and it also has the right to repeal any law that is wrong in principle and in conflict with the will of the majority, and which is executed by either of the departments for which the appropriation is made.

But, sir, this is a matter of parliamentary usage. It has been practiced so long "whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." By precedent and practice it has been ingrafted into the parliamentary law of Congress. Certainly our republican friends should not complain of this class of legislation. Now, sir, from the 5th of July, 1862, until the 3d day of March, 1875, the number of acts of general legislation tacked on appropriation bills were three hundred and eighty-seven. These sections of general legislation will be found on the Indian, Army, legislative, executive, and judicial, sundry civil, consular and diplomatic, deficiency, Navy, and Military Academy appropriation bills, and can be found under these heads, commencing in volume 12 and ending in volume 18 of the Statutes at Large

During all this period of time, from the 5th of July, 1862, to the 3d day of March, 1875, the republican party had the undisputed control of both Houses of Congress, and after this superfluity of precedents made by themselves it comes with an ill grace from them to say that we have no right to put any general legislation on the appropriation bills. We are only asking to repeal part of the bad legislation heretofore passed by our political opponents, and a part of which was tacked on the sundry civil appropriation bill of 1871.

Why, sir, on the Army appropriation bill of 1867 (Statutes at Large, volume 14, pages 486 and 487) was put a measure of legislation which deprived the President of the United States of his constitutional powers as Commander-in-Chief of the Army. It fixes the headquarters of the General of the Army in Washington, and provides that all orders relating to military operations shall be issued through the General of the Army, and that he shall not be removed, suspended, or relieved from command or assigned to duty elsewhere than at headquarters, except at his own request, without the previous approval of the Senate, and that all orders issued contrary to the section shall be null and void. This was intended to degrade the then President of the United States because he did not approve the bad legislation then being enacted.

In 1856 the republicans had a majority in this House, while the democrats had a majority in the Senate. The Kansas trouble was upon us, and the House put on a section in the Army appropriation bill declaring that the Army should not be used for certain purposes, directing in that appropriation bill how the Army should and should not be used. When the bill was under consideration in the Senate the cry of revolution, as now made because of this proposed legislation, was met by old Ben. Wade, then a republican Senator from Ohio, in the following strong language:

Here we are told it is revolutionary, and therefore we must not breathe the breath of life into their action, but must permit it to go back to the House with an appeal to the House to recede. Sir, I do not know but that you may succeed under the idea that this is revolution; but, so help me God, I hope that the man who proposes to recede a hair's breadth from the action of the House will never find his way back again; and I do not believe he will.

Mr. Chairman, I especially commend this language to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] as well as to the other gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber.

Now, sir, I do not perceive any reason for this cry of starving the nation to death. When these bills are passed they will be presented to the President for his approval. The Army bill appropriates $26,797,300; the legislative, judicial, and executive bill appropriates $15,154,475.60. These sums are all that are required for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880. If the President approves the bills, then the nation will not be starved to death; but if the President says to Congress, the immediate representatives of the people, "I will not approve of the appro priation bills, but will veto them," then he becomes responsible if the nation is starved to death. I do not fear this. The history of this country does not show a single instance where a bill repealingan act of Congress has been vetoed.

But, sir, it is suggested that the people of this nation are being starved to death by the ruinous financial policy of the President and his advisers. The financial suffering of our people bears emphatic witness to the truth of this charge. Now, sir, to relieve the people by wise and just financial legislation should be the aspiration of the members of both Houses of Congress. The cry of hate and sectional strife should be hushed, and we should give heed to the wail of distress that comes to us from the farmers, mechanics, laboring-men and all engaged in every kind of business who were formerly in comfortable circumstances. Here is a field worthy of our efforts—to aid in building up the depressed business of the country, to relieve the people from universal bankruptcy. Under the present Administration the money-changers have the people by the throat.

The Administration demands legislation and construes the laws to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. The rich bondholder pays no taxes, although the poor man does pay taxes on the log house in which he shelters his family. The bondholder gets gold interest, and the wounded soldier, the defender of his country, is paid in paper currency. Indeed it is asserted that the pensions of the widows and orphans are held back an insufferable length of time because the money it requires to pay these pensions will interfere with the specie-resumption policy of the Administration. The men who saved the nation in its darker hours are being starved to death in order to carry out a policy to enrich a favored class. Why, sir, only the other day when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCMAHON] offered the following amendment to the appropriation for the Pension Department—

In order to provide for the speedy payment of arrearages of pensions, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue immediately in payment thereof, as they may be adjusted, the ten millions of dollars in legal-tender currency now in the United States Treasury, kept as a special fund for the redemption of fractional currency—how was this just proposition met? Sir, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] raised the point of order and declared it was "the entering wedge to a general purpose to break down the system of reserves on which the maintenance of resumption depends." But, notwithstanding this, the amendment was adopted. I have referred to this matter simply to show that the gentlemen who are so loud in their cry about the democrats starving the nation to death are the last to help to feed the soldier who saved the nation.

Now, sir, the issue is made. We throw down the gage of battle. We squarely plant ourselves on the issues raised in these bills. We are for the Constitution of our country, good laws which will bring back prosperity to our people, the freedom of the citizen, the purity of the ballot-box, and the independence of the voter.

I yield the rest of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DICKEY.]

Mr. DICKEY. Mr. Chairman, the great questions of civil government that have caused this Congress to convene in extra session grow out of legislation enacted during the war, or shortly after, by the republican party, chiefly with a view to maintain themselves in power. The legislation is all partisan in its character. No impartial man can read these sections without conviction that their aim and purpose was as I have stated.

It is unnecessary to enter into a discussion now and give reasons for the repeal of the jury test oath. There seems to be little or no objection to its repeal. I will therefore but briefly notice it. Under the head of "the judiciary" in the Revised Statutes, sections 820 and 821, are found the causes of disqualification and challenge of grand and petit jurors of the United States in the following language:

SEC. 820. The following shall be causes of disqualification and challenge of grand and petit jurors in the courts of the United States, in addition to the causes existing by virtue of section 812, namely: without duress and coercion to have taken up arms or to have joined any insurrection or rebellion against the United States; to have adhered to any insurrection or rebellion, giving it aid and comfort; to have given, directly or indirectly, any assistance in money, arms, horses, clothes, or anything whatever, to or for the use or benefit of any person whom the giver of such assistance knew to have joined, or to be about to join, any insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States, or whom he had good ground to believe to have joined, or to be about to join, any insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States; or to have counseled or advised any person to join any insurrection or rebellion, or to resist with force of arms the laws of the United States.

SEC. 821. At every term of any court of the United States the district attorney, or other person acting on behalf of the United States in said court, may move, and the court, in their discretion, may require the clerk to tender to every person summoned to serve as a grand or petit juror, or venireman or talesman, in said court, the following oath or affirmation, namely: "You do solemnly swear (or affirm) that you will support the Constitution of the United States of America; that you have not, without duress and constraint, taken up arms or joined any insurrection or rebellion against the United States; that you have not adhered to any insurrection or rebellion, giving it aid and comfort; that you have not, directly or indirectly, given any assistance in money, or any other thing, to any person or persons whom you knew, or had good ground to believe, to have joined, or to be about to join, said insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States; and that you have not counseled or advised any person to join any insurrection or rebellion against, or to resist with force of arms, the laws of the United States." Any person declining to take said oath shall be discharged by the court from serving on the grand or petit jury, or venire, to which he may have been summoned.

These sections were passed June 17, 1862, (volume 12, page 430,) in the midst of civil war, and whatever the propriety or necessity for them then the reason for their existence has long since ceased, and therefore they ought to be repealed. They are now manifestly improper and unjust. They exclude from the grand and petit juries the great mass of intelligent men who lived in the Southern States during the war. These men may hold any office in the gift of the people or of appointment by the President of the United States, as many of them do, but by the provisions of these sections are disqualified from sitting upon juries involving the simplest questions of the right of property.

The republican Congress of 1871, seeing the manifest injustice of this law, by an act approved April 20, 1871, volume 17, page 15, repealed it; and it never was the intention of Congress since that time that these sections should have any place in the laws of the Government. How comes it, then, that they are in the statutes of to-day? They were not re-enacted as independent measures by Congress. No bill was ever introduced for their re-enactment. They were never approved by the President of the United States, so that it must be either by inadvertence, mistake, or fraud upon the law-making power that they are to-day in the statutes. How did this happen? By an act approved June 27, 1866, three commissioners were authorized to be appointed, whose duty it should be "to revise, simplify, arrange, and consolidate all the statutes of the United States, general and permanent in their nature, which shall be in force at the time such commissioners may make the final report of their doings."

It will be seen by this provision that these commissioners had no authority to incorporate into the body of the Revised Statutes any law that had, before their final report should be made, been repealed by Congress. On the 22d of June, 1874, an act was passed providing that the statutes of the United States general and permanent in their nature on the 1st day of December, 1873, as revised and consolidated by the commissioners, shall be designated and cited as the Revised Statutes of the United States. These Revised Statutes contain, as I have said, these sections in regard to juries. I do not believe they are constitutionally in the statutes of the United States, but some of the courts continue to treat them as in force, and hence the necessity and propriety of their repeal.

THE ELECTIVE FRANCHISE.

I now come to consider those questions which more immediately affect the great body of the people. Those questions which were strangers to the laws of this country prior to the advent of the republican party, and which, in every view of them, tend to extend the power of the Federal Government far beyond its constitutional limits, and which, in the interest of liberty and fair elections, the democracy of the country are pledged to repeal.

The first of these is section 2002 of the Revised Statutes, and is as follows:

SEC. 2002. No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control, any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States or to keep the peace at the polls.

It is proposed to repeal the words "or to keep the peace at the polls." If there is any day in the year in which the people should be entirely free from all Federal interference and bayonet rule, it is on the election day, for it is then that the Government in a certain sense returns into the hands of the people, and they are indeed sovereign. They may dictate new policies and new laws by the election of such men representing such principles as they desire shall be enacted into law. So that it would be subversive of their rights as freemen for the Federal Government to interfere in any degree with their perfect freedom on that day. Our Government is based upon the idea of virtue and intelligence in the people of the country, and it is unreasonable and unjust to place it in the power of any man to interfere with their perfect freedom in expressing their wishes at the ballot-box.

Again, there is no constitutional warrant for converting the Army of the United States into police officers to keep peace at the polls; the constitutional provision being section 4 of article 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.

So that it is only upon the application of the Legislature of a State, or the governor of a State when the Legislature cannot be convened, that the General Government has constitutional power to send troops into a State to protect it against domestic violence. To make mere peace officers of the Army of the United States at election places, when there is no violence, never was contemplated by the framers of the Constitution. Again, if the government of the State, under the constitution and laws thereof, is "republican in form," as required by this section, there is nothing in this regard for the General Government to do. The people of the State have complied with the requirements of the Constitution, and their local government, including laws relating to elections, is clearly, wholly, and lawfully in their hands and under their control. For the General Government to undertake to make and enforce different laws, though they be also "republican in form," is a usurpation unwarranted by the Constitution.

But when this section comes to be considered in connection with the sections relating to supervisors, marshals, and deputy marshals, as connected with elections, the injustice and unconstitutionality of the provisions will be still more apparent. These sections are as follows:

SEC. 2016. The supervisors of election, so appointed, are authorized and required to attend at all times and places fixed for the registration of voters, who, being registered, would be entitled to vote for a Representative or Delegate in Congress, and to challenge any person offering to register; to attend at all times and places when the names of registered voters may be marked for challenge, and to cause such names registered as they may deem proper to be so marked; to make, when required, the lists, or either of them, provided for in section 2026, and verify the same; and upon any occasion, and at any time when in attendance upon the duty herein prescribed, to personally inspect and scrutinize such registry, and for purposes of identification to affix their signature to each page of the original list, and of each copy of any such list of registered voters, at such times, upon each day when any name may be received, entered, or registered, and in such manner as will, in their judgment, detect and expose the improper or wrongful removal therefrom, or addition thereto, of any name.

SEC. 2018. To the end that each candidate for the office of Representative or Delegate in Congress may obtain the benefit of every vote for him cast, the supervisors of election are, and each of them is, required to personally scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot in their election district or voting precinct cast, whatever may be the indorsement on the ballot, or in whatever box it may have been placed or be found; to make and forward to the officer who, in accordance with the provisions of section 2025, has been designated as the chief supervisor of the judicial district in which the city or town wherein they may serve, acts, such certificates and returns of all such ballots as such officer may direct and require, and to attach to the registry list, and any and all copies thereof and to any certificate, statement, or return, whether the same, or any part or portion thereof, be required by any law of the United States, or of any State, territorial, or municipal law, any statement touching the truth or accuracy of the registry, or the truth or fairness of the election and canvass, which the supervisors of the election, or either of them, may desire to make or attach, or which should properly and honestly be made or attached, in order that the facts may become known.

SEC. 2020. When in any election district or voting precinct in any city or town, for which there have been appointed supervisors of election for any election at which a Representative or Delegate in Congress is voted for, the supervisors of election are not allowed to exercise and discharge, fully and freely, and without bribery, solicitation, interference, hinderance, molestation, violence, or threats thereof, on the part of any person, all the duties, obligations, and powers conferred upon them by law, the supervisors of election shall make prompt report, under oath, within ten days after the day of election to the officer who, in accordance with the provisions of section 2025, has been designated as the chief supervisor of the judicial district in which the city or town wherein they served, acts, of the manner and means by which they were not so allowed to fully and freely exercise and discharge the duties and obligations required and imposed herein. And upon receiving any such report, the chief supervisor, acting both in such capacity and officially as a commissioner of the circuit court, shall forthwith examine into all the facts; and he shall have power to subpœna and compel the attendance before him of any witness, and to administer oaths and take testimony in respect to the charges made; and, prior to the assembling of the Congress for which any such Representative or Delegate was voted for, he shall file with the clerk of the House of Representatives all the evidence by him taken, all information by him obtained, and all reports to him made.

SEC. 2021. Whenever an election at which Representatives or Delegates in Congress are to be chosen is held in any city or town of twenty thousand inhabitants or upward, the marshal for the district in which the city or town is situated shall, on the application in writing of at least two citizens residing in such city or town, appoint special deputy marshals, whose duty it shall be, when required thereto, to aid and assist the supervisors of election in the verification of any list of persons who may have registered or voted; to attend in each election district or voting precinct at the times and places fixed for the registration of voters, and at all times or places when and where the registration may by law be scrutinized, and the names of registered voters be marked for challenge; and also to attend, at all times for holding elections, the polls in such district or precinct.

SEC. 2022. The marshal and his general deputies, and such special deputies, shall keep the peace, and support and protect the supervisors of election in the discharge of their duties, preserve order at such places of registration and at such polls, prevent fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting thereat, or fraudulent conduct on the part of any officer of election, and immediately, either at the place of registration or polling place, or elsewhere, and either before or after registering or voting, to arrest and take into custody, with or without process, any person who commits, or attempts or offers to commit, any of the acts or offenses prohibited herein, or who commits any offense against the laws of the United States; but no person shall be arrested without process for any offense not committed in the presence of the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, or of the supervisors of election, or either of them, and, for the purposes of arrest or the preservation of the peace, the supervisors of election shall, in the absence of the marshal's deputies, or if required to assist such deputies have the same duties and powers as deputy-marshals; nor shall any person, on the day of such election, be arrested without process for any offense committed on the day of registration.

SEC. 2023. Whenever any arrest is made under any provision of this title, the person so arrested shall forthwith be brought before a commissioner, judge, or court of the United States for examination of the offenses alleged against him; and such commissioner, judge, or court shall proceed in respect thereto as authorized by law in case of crimes against the United States.

SEC. 2024. The marshal or his general deputies, or such special deputies as are thereto specially empowered by him, in writing, and under his hand and seal, whenever he or either or any of them is forcibly resisted in executing their duties under this title, or shall, by violence, threats, or menaces, be prevented from executing such duties, or from arresting any person who has committed any offense for which the marshal or his general or his special deputies are authorized to make such arrest, are, and each of them is, empowered to summon and call to his aid the bystanders or posse comitatus of his district.

SEC. 2025. The circuit courts of the United States for each judicial circuit shall name and appoint, on or before the 1st day of May, in the year 1871, and thereafter as vacancies may from any cause arise, from among the circuit court commissioners for each judicial district in each judicial circuit, one of such officers, who shall be known for the duties required of him under this title as the chief supervisor of elections of the judicial district for which he is a commissioner, and shall, so long as faithful and capable, discharge the duties in this title imposed.

SEC. 2026. The chief supervisor shall prepare and furnish all necessary books, forms, blanks, and instructions for the use and direction of the supervisors of election in the several cities and towns in their respective districts; he shall receive the applications of all parties for appointment to such positions; upon the opening, as contemplated in section 2012, of the circuit court for the judicial circuit in which the commissioner so designated acts, he shall present such applications to the judge thereof, and furnish information to him in respect to the appointment by the court of such supervisors of election; he shall require of the supervisors of election, when necessary, lists of the persons who may register and vote, or either, in their respective election districts or voting precincts, and cause the names of those upon any such list whose right to register or vote is honestly doubted to be verified by proper inquiry and examination at the respective places by them assigned as their residences; and he shall receive, preserve, and file all oaths of office of supervisors of election, and of all special deputy marshals appointed under the provisions of this title, and all certificates, returns, reports, and records of every kind and nature contemplated or made requisite by the provisions hereof, save where otherwise herein specially directed

SEC. 2027. All United States marshals and commissioners who in any judicial district perform any duties under the preceding provisions relating to, concerning, or affecting the election of Representatives or Delegates in the Congress of the United States, from time to time, and, with all due diligence, shall forward to the chief supervisor in and for their judicial district, all complaints, examinations, and records pertaining thereto, and all oaths of office by them administered to any supervisor of election or special deputy marshal, in order that the same may be properly preserved and filed.

SEC. 2031. There shall be allowed and paid to the chief supervisor for his services as such officer, the following compensation, apart from and in excess of all fees allowed by law for the performance of any duty as circuit court commissioner: For filing and caring for every return, report, record, document, or other paper required to be filed by him under any of the preceding provisions, ten cents; for affixing a seal to any paper, record, report, or instrument, twenty cents; for entering and indexing the records of his office, fifteen cents per folio; and for arranging and transmitting to Congress, as provided for in section 2020, any report, statement, record, return, or examination, for each folio, fifteen cents; and for any copy thereof, or of any paper on file, a like sum. * * * And the fees of the chief supervisors shall be paid at the Treasury of the United States, such accounts to be made out, verified, examined, and certified as in the case of accounts of commissioners, save that the examination or certificate required may be made by either the circuit or district judge.

The Forty-fifth Congress adjourned without passing two of the great appropriation bills necessary for the support of the Government. The one for the support of the Army, the other the legislative, executive, and judicial bill. The House of Representatives was democratic; the Senate was republican. The House passed the bills, the same ones that are under consideration now, and with them the repeal and modification of the laws I have named. They went to the republican Senate and that body refused to pass them in that form, and the Forty-fifth Congress expired by limitation of law, and on the 18th of March the President convened the present extra session. I do not care to argue now who was at fault, or whether anybody shall be blamed for the failure of the Forty-fifth Congress to pass these bills. It is enough to know that the democratic House passed them and the republican Senate refused to pass them. The issue is squarely made and the parties as squarely divided, and the questions briefly stated are: Shall the jury iron-clad test oath and the statute authorizing the civil authorities of the General Government to call troops to the polls; the sections authorizing interference with the voters by Federal supervisors, marshals, overseers, spies, and paid electioneerers be repealed? The democratic party respond "Yes; the Constitution requires it; freedom of elections and liberty demand it." Let me briefly summarize these laws.

First. That two citizens may be appointed by the judge of the circuit court of the United States, to be known as supervisors of elections.

Second. These supervisors are required to attend at all times and places fixed for the registration of voters who would be entitled to vote for a Representative or Delegate in Congress; and to challenge any person offering to register, and to personally inspect and scrutinize such registry.

Third. These supervisors are also required to attend at all times and places for the holding elections of Representatives or Delegates in Congress; and to remain and personally inspect and scrutinize, on the day of election, the manner in which the voting is done, and the way and method in which the poll-books, tallies, &c., are kept.

Fourth. They are required to personally scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot cast in their election district or voting precinct.

Fifth. They are directed, on the day of election, to take, occupy, and remain in such position, whether before or behind the ballot-boxes, as will best enable them to see each person offering to vote or register; and at the closing of the polls they are required to place themselves in such position, in relation to the ballot-boxes, for the purpose of canvassing the ballots, and there remain until the work is complete.

Sixth. Whenever an election, at which Representatives or Delegates in Congress are to be chosen, is held in any city of twenty thousand inhabitants or upward, the marshal for the district shall, on application of two citizens, appoint any number of special deputy marshals to assist the supervisors.

Seventh. The marshal, his general deputies, and special deputies are empowered to arrest and take into custody any person without process, and carry the person so arrested before a commissioner, judge, or court of the United States for examination, according to law in case of crimes against the United States.

Eighth. In addition there is the necessary machinery, powers, fees, per diem, &c., for carrying into effect those provisions.

Thus it will be readily seen that it is the voter who is interfered with by these laws as well as an additional count provided for. Now, I ask by what authority the United States can interrupt or interfere with peaceable voters on election day? Article 1, section 2, of the Constitution provides that "the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for an elector of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature." By this provision of the Constitution the several States of this Union have the original and only authority to fix and determine who shall be voters at all elections. It is true that by the fifteenth amendment of the Constitution the States are denied the power to abridge the right of citizens to vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. But the Supreme Court of the United States, in 2 Otto, 215, holds as follows:

> The power of Congress to legislate at all upon the subject of voting at State elections rests upon this amendment, and can be exercised by providing a punishment only when the wrongful refusal to receive the vote of a qualified elector at such elections is because of his color, race, or previous condition of servitude.

In discussing this question of the right of suffrage and what power shall control it, Mr. Hamilton, in the sixtieth number of the Federalist, says:

> This forms no part of the power to be conferred upon the National Government. Its authority would be expressly restricted to the regulation of the time, places, and manner of elections. The qualifications of the persons who may choose or be chosen, as has been remarked upon another occasion, are defined and fixed in the Constitution, and are unalterable by the (Federal) Legislature.

Again, in the fifty-second number, in speaking of the qualifications of electors, he says:

> They are to be the same with those of the electors of the most numerous branch of State Legislatures. The definition of the right of suffrage is very justly regarded as a fundamental article of republican government. It was incumbent on the convention, therefore, to define and establish this right in the Constitution. To have left it open for the national regulation of Congress would have been improper, for the same reason and for the additional reason just mentioned. To have submitted it to the legislative discretion of the States would have been improper, for the same reason and for the additional reason that it would have rendered too dependent on the State government that branch of the Federal Government which ought to be dependent on the people alone. It must be satisfactory to every State, because it is conformable to the standard already established or which may be established by the State itself. It will be safe to the United States, because, being fixed by the State constitutions, it is not alterable by the State governments, and it cannot be feared that the people of the States will alter this part of their constitutions in such a manner as to abridge the rights secured to them by the Federal Constitution.

Again and again has the Supreme Court decided that the right to vote in the States comes from the States. In support of this I cite the case of Minor vs. Happersett, 21 Wallace, 178:

> The Supreme Court decided that the Constitution of the United States has not conferred the right of suffrage upon any one, and that the United States has no voters of its own creation in the States. And in the Grant parish case it is said "the right to vote in the States comes from the States."

Also 2 Otto, page 555:

> In Minor vs. Happersett, 21 Wall., 178, we decided that the Constitution of the United States has not conferred the right of suffrage upon any one, and that the United States have no voters of their own creation in the States. In United States vs. Reese et al., supra, page 214, we hold that the fifteenth amendment has invested the citizens of the United States with the new constitutional right, which is exemption from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. From this it appears that the right of suffrage is not a necessary attribute of national citizenship; but that exemption from discrimination in the exercise of that right on account of race, &c., is. The right to vote in the States comes from the States; but the right of exemption from the prohibited discrimination comes from the United States. The first has not been granted or secured by the Constitution of the United States, but the last has been.

And in the case of The United States against Cruikshank et al., 2 Otto, 542, the court say:

The duty of protecting all its citizens in the enjoyment of an equality of rights was originally assumed by the States, and it still remains there. The only obligation resting upon the United States is to see that the States do not deny the right. The power of the National Government is limited to the enforcement of this guarantee.

They further say:

We have in our political system a Government of the United States, and a government of each of the several States. Each one of these governments is distinct from the others, and each has citizens of its own who owe it allegiance, and whose rights within its jurisdiction it must protect. * * * The people of the United States, resident within any State, are subject to two governments, one State and the other national, but there need be no conflict between the two. The powers which one possesses the other does not. They are established for different purposes, and have separate jurisdictions. * * * The Government of the United States is one of delegated powers alone. Its authority is defined and limited by the Constitution. All powers not granted to it by that instrument are reserved to the States or the people. No rights can be acquired under the Constitution or laws of the United States except such as the Government of the United States has the authority to grant or secure. All that cannot be so granted or secured are left under the protection of the States.

So that the question as to who voters are, and by what authority they vote, seems so clearly and unquestionably settled by the Constitution and the decisions of the Supreme Court as to need no argument. And it cannot be denied that the laws under consideration are directed against the voter, for they seek to interfere with the voter; they undertake to arrest and restrain him on election day upon the mere suspicion that he may not be a legal voter, not under the Federal law but under the law of the State of which he is a resident.

But it is section 4 of article 1 under which it is more particularly claimed that this right and power in Congress exists. The section is as follows:

SEC. 4. The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

This provision of the Constitution was framed with reference to the laws of the States, and not with reference to the action of the people under them. These laws, without altering the election laws of the State, are supplemental in their nature to the State laws. It does not seem to be an attempt to make or alter, as the Constitution says, but rather an attempt to force in overseers for the States. But if the laws of the States are fair, just, and constitutional for the election of Representatives, there is the end of the matter, and Congress cannot interfere without usurpation of the rights and powers of the State. The State has exercised its constitutional duty and there is no opportunity for the exercise of this power of the General Government. There is nothing to call it into action. The primary machinery of the Constitution occupies all the ground, and the secondary, or ultimate machinery, cannot operate.

If there is no person in a State who desires to be represented in Congress and the State has no law for the election of Representatives, the enacting of a law by Congress for elections in that State could not compel the people to elect Representatives. There must be a party in the State willing to be represented. The people may decline to elect Representatives, and yet remain in the Union, subject to all other laws. There is no force in the case. Hence I maintain that this provision relates solely to the question of whether or not the people desire to be represented and whether or not the State has proper laws for elections, and upon this depends the inquiry, whether or not Congress can interfere.

Does the State and the General Government possess a power in common on the subject of regulating elections? If so they may come in conflict, and surely no one will contend that the framers of the Constitution intended any such thing as that. By this section of the Constitution it is made the duty of each State to fix the time, places, and the manner of holding elections. The State may have made regulations best suited to its tastes, perfectly constitutional and in harmony with the whole theory of our Government. The Federal Government, nevertheless, according to the claims set up here, may override and overthrow such regulations and enforce others better adapted to the desires and designs of the party which happen to have control of Congress. And these very laws now under discussion are but the offshoot of designing partisans, intended through their operations to keep in power the party that enacted them.

This power of the States to regulate elections is something more than a reserved right of the State. It is not an express grant of power to the States, but is a power which existed in the States, not only reserved by them but was expressed in the Constitution, and is mandatory in its nature.

It would be unconstitutional in a State to fail to enact proper election laws. But having complied with their constitutional duty, having enacted laws in harmony with the spirit, intent, and letter of the Constitution, is it not, I ask, a clear and palpable violation of the plain constitutional right and power of the State for Congress to override and overthrow, under its secondary and ultimate power, the lawful machinery of the State?

And this claim is all the more startling when we consider the indisputable fact that voting is purely the creation of the State, that the voter is amenable to the State only, and the fact that these laws, enacted under a constitutional clause which contemplates only the exercise of an ultimate power for the preservation of a right of the State to be represented in Congress, attacks and assails the voter and deprives him of his inestimable privilege.

No such construction of this section of the Constitution has ever been given by any respectable authority, and I emphatically deny that any such conflict of power exists. It is not complained by anybody that every State in this Union has not upon its statute-books fair and constitutional election laws, with full power to enforce them. But let us more carefully examine these statutes with relation to their constitutionality. They do not undertake to affect the time, the place, nor the manner of elections.

Hamilton, in the fifty-ninth number of the Federalist, in discussing this section of the Constitution, says:

Its propriety rests upon the evidence of this plain proposition, that every government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation.

So that it is evident that even Mr. Hamilton, who ought to be recognized by the other side as authority, regarded this section of the Constitution only as a means of preserving the Government in case the States should fail to make proper provision for the election of Representatives and Senators.

Again, in the same number, he says:

It will not be alleged that an election law could have been framed and inserted in the Constitution which would have been applicable to every probable change in the situation of the country, and it will therefore not be denied that a discretionary power over elections ought to exist somewhere. It will, I presume, be as readily conceded that there were only three ways in which this power could have been reasonably organized; that it must either have been lodged wholly in the National Legislature or wholly in the State Legislatures, or primarily in the latter and ultimately in the former. The last mode has with reason been preferred by the convention. They have submitted the regulation of elections for the Federal Government in the first instance to the local administrations.

Judge Paschal, in his reprinted notes on the Constitution, says:

That the manner of conducting elections as mentioned in the Constitution means by ballot or viva voce. Manner relates to the method or form, and is never applied to vital or substantial matter, no more than the manner of speaking is to the subject-matter and essence of the speech; the method or form of voting may be by ballot or orally; but the vital part of suffrage, the person voted for and the free and untrammeled right to exercise that franchise as a citizen of a State, cannot be controverted, subject of course to the law of necessity, when the contingency may arise for its exercise.

Story on the Constitution says:

In the first place the power may be applied by Congress to correct any negligence in a State in regard to elections as well as to prevent a dissolution of the Government by designing or refractory States, urged on by some temporary excitements. In the next place, it will operate as a check in favor of the people against the designs of a Federal Senate and their constituents to deprive the people of the State of their right to choose Representatives.

In the next place, it provides a remedy for the evil if any State, by reason of invasion or other cause, cannot have it in its power to appoint a place where the citizen can safely meet to choose Representatives.

It has been argued on the other side that if a faction controlling a State should declare that all the electors in a congressional district shall vote in one town at the extreme corner of a district of twenty counties, this Congress certainly has the right to interfere and to say there shall be a voting place provided for so many inhabitants or for so many square miles.

Now, suppose we grant the extreme and unheard of case as put. Then there would be some pretext for Congress exercising its ultimate power, for then the primary power of the State would have been improperly and unjustly exercised as against the people. But it is not pretended that any State has at any time provided such unjust legislation in regard to elections. The exercise of the ultimate power in Congress to legislate upon this subject would in that event properly arise; or when the State failed to provide for the election of Representatives to Congress, this body would then have the right to exercise its power of providing for elections, both as to the time, places, and manner. For this section of the Constitution was formed upon the theory that there would always be a party in the State willing to support the Federal Government, and, although those controlling the State Legislature might repeal all laws in relation to the election of members of Congress, Congress would have power to enable that party of the State who adhered to the Federal Government to send Representatives to Congress. But are not the Legislatures of the States a little nearer the people than Congress? Have not all the States just, fair, and constitutional laws of their own making for the preservation and purity of the ballot-box and the election of Representatives? And suppose it is as my friend from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] says, "a concurrent jurisdiction," which I deny. Still, have not the States, legally and in harmony with the Constitution, exercised their jurisdiction as required by the Constitution first; and is it not a fair and well recognized principle of law that where there is concurrent jurisdiction the power first lawfully exercising it holds and controls it?

Again, why should it be argued that Congress, in the exercise of its power, would be more fair or just than the State Legislature? Is it not more reasonable to believe that those nearer the people, where any abuse could and would be more readily corrected by the people themselves, would more carefully and scrupulously guard their interests in free and fair elections than a more distant and cumbersome government would? Are gentlemen on the other side afraid to trust the people? Has your brief imperial sway of power so destroyed the principles of free government and the relation of States to the General Government that you have come to think that the will of Congress is superior to the Constitution? We think it is not, and we propose to take that idea out of Congress. We intend to wipe away the gloom that has hung like a pall over this country, brought on by legislation under this false theory of yours. We intend to repeal your anti-republican and centralizing laws, and enact such statutes as will give relief to the people, and place the country on the highway of prosperity. The people are down—down under the weight of your oppressive, unjust, and class legislation. We intend, so far as in our power lies, to place them on their feet again. They see and understand the broad and underlying distinction between the principles of the two great parties of this country. In yours they see a strong centralized government permeating every highway and by-way, every village and every hamlet with an oppressive and heavy hand, limiting their liberties and impoverishing their homes; in ours they see local self-government, equal taxation, just and much-needed financial reform, as well as revenue reform, so that the burdens of the Government will fall more lightly and evenly upon them. These differences between our parties are wide and distinct. They are the very fundamental elements upon which the great parties rest, and upon them we are willing to go before the people and abide by their voice.

You have been reconstructing for years, and all your measures of reconstruction tend to centralization and despotism. We intend to restore the Union of the fathers. We intend to return to local self-government as the old landmark of safety and liberty. Your encroachments upon the rights of States to regulate in a constitutional way the elections was usurpation. Our Government in theory is republican in form, and we intend to make it so in practice. Local self-government will guard liberty and the rights of citizens far more securely and better than centralized power.

Jefferson, in his first inaugural as President of the United States, declared the principles of the Government to be—

> Equal and exact justice to all men of whatever state or persuasion, religions or political; the support of the State governments in all their rights as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns, and the surest bulwarks against anti-republican tendencies; the preservation of the General Government in its whole constitutional vigor as the sheet-anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad and jealous care of the rights of elections by the people. * * * The supremacy of the civil over the military authority; economy in the public expenses that labor may be lightly burdened; the honest payment of our debts and sacred preservation of the public faith; the encouragement of agriculture and of commerce as its handmaid; the diffusion of information and arraignment of all abuses at the bar of public reason; freedom of religion, freedom of the press, and freedom of persons under the protection of the habeas corpus and trial by juries impartially selected. These principles formed the bright constellation which has gone before us and guided our steps through an age of revolution and reformation.

These are the fundamental principles of the democratic party. It is the creed by which we stand, and it is from the doctrines as taught by the fathers that we have learned to oppose all such unreasonable and unjust measures as are found embodied in the laws we seek to repeal. There are other objections to these laws than those I have named. The extraordinary expenses paid out of the common Treasury of the people is an objection worthy of some consideration. I submit a table claimed to be compiled from official sources, which shows the extraordinary uses to which this law has been applied:

Thus showing that for the years 1876 and 1878 you had in the service of the republican party over twenty-six thousand electioneerers, who were paid with the people's money, taken from the Treasury, the enormous sum of $513,635.51. No wonder you struggle to keep this force in the field, for you know that upon this fraudulent, unlawful, and villainous scheme hangs your hope of power in the future.

One other reason for the repeal of these laws, and I shall have done with the subject. It is the policy of the democratic party to keep the General Government, in the exercise of its powers, within the constitutional limitations. And this we do in the interest of the people, in the interest of liberty, in the interest of good government, in the interest of the Union, the Constitution, and their perpetuation. It is the policy of the republican party to build an empire upon the ruins of our Republic, which, by insidious and constant encroachments upon the well-defined landmarks of liberty, you seek to destroy. This must not, shall not be, and these laws must be repealed, as one necessary step in the direction of the preservation of constitutional liberty.

THE VETO POWER.

We have been threatened again and again with the veto power. Let us briefly consider this power. Hamilton, in the seventy-third number of the Federalist, uses this language:

> The primary inducement to conferring the power in question upon the Executive is to enable him to defend himself. The secondary is to increase the chances in favor of the community against the passing of bad laws, through haste, inadvertence, or design.

> A king of Great Britain, with all his train of sovereign attributes and with the influence he draws from a thousand sources, would at this day hesitate to put a negative upon the joint resolutions of the two houses of Parliament. He would not fail to exert the utmost resources of that influence to strangle the measure disagreeable to him in its progress to the throne to avoid being reduced to the dilemma of permitting it to take effect, or to risking the disfavor of the nation by an opposition to the sense of the legislative body. Nor is it probable that he would ultimately venture to exert his prerogative but in a case of propriety or extreme necessity. If a magistrate so powerful and so well fortified as a British monarch would have scruples as to the exercise of the power under consideration, how much greater caution may be reasonably expected in a President of the United States clothed for a short period of four years with the executive authority of a government wholly and purely republican.

Much has been said on the other side about this nation and the power of the nation. Gentlemen argue as though this were a united state and that all the law-making power of the land was vested in Congress; but they must remember that these are united states, a union of States, each State retaining all power not delegated to the United States, and not a State. This proposed legislation does not in any way encroach upon the powers of the President. It is not hasty, for it is the same as proposed and discussed in the Forty-fifth Congress. And the freest and fullest debate has been allowed here. It is not against public good, but, on the contrary, is for local self-government as against centralized power, and is in perfect harmony with the spirit and genius of our institution. It is constitutional. It seeks only to repeal laws of at least doubtful constitutionality and we believe wholly unconstitutional. The country is at perfect peace. Elections are transpiring quietly and fairly. There are no extraordinary circumstances, no extreme necessities, no occasion in the world for the existence of these laws, and were they offered for the first time here to-day I do not believe they would receive the support of the other side of this House.

And should they pass I am sure they ought and I have no doubt would be vetoed, with such just and satisfactory constitutional reasons as would put a quietus upon them forever. There is not in the whole history of the Government a single instance to be found where the veto power was exercised for the mere repealing of a statute.

Again, we are charged with being revolutionists, with attempting to coerce the President, and to subvert the Government. Upon what grounds gentlemen place these grave charges I am wholly at a loss to understand. They cry "thief" when there is no thief. They cry "treason" when there is no treason, and "revolution" when there is no revolution. They yell "confederates" when there are no confederates, for all on this floor are equals under the laws and Constitution. They try to alarm the country by the most extraordinary and unfounded charges, by magnifying mole-hills into mountains, by fleeing when no man pursueth, and when at last defeated and overthrown, quietly and gently they subside; for all is well, the people are free, and the Constitution preserved.

But while on this subject of coercing the President let me quote from the speech of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BARBER.] He said:

> But this I do know.
> Mark you, he says he knows it.
> I do know, if the Chief Magistrate of this country, in the event of this bill passing both Houses of Congress, should approve and sign it, so that it should become a law, he [the President] will incur the lasting execration of an overwhelming majority of the people of the North.

The party lash is raised over the President by his own friends, and yet they charge us with coercing him! Where did the gentleman get this information? Who authorized him to speak so emphatically for the people of the North? Did he draw his inspiration from the splendid victory in the election in Chicago, which made that sterling democrat, Carter Harrison, the mayor of that city; or is it the bombast of fury finding vent from the expiring lion? In any event, I feel confident the President is not trembling under such idle, empty, and unfounded threatenings as that; and I further feel confident that when these bills shall have passed both branches of Congress, and have been sent to the President for his signature, he will not veto them, but, in justice to the country and in obedience to the voice of the people, will approve them.

Mr. PRICE obtained the floor.

Mr. ATKINS. If the gentleman from Iowa will yield I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. PRICE. Certainly.

Mr. ATKINS. Then I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PAY OF COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. HENRY. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the committees of this House designated on the 15th instant as entitled to clerks under the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill making appropriations for the year ending June 30, 1880, be, and they are hereby, authorized to employ clerks during the session within the present fiscal year, and any excess of clerks hereby authorized over the number provided for by existing law shall, under the direction of the Committee of Accounts, be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. CONGER. Does that come from the Committee of Accounts?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that it does.

Mr. HENRY. The resolution does not come from the Committee of Accounts. The only object of it is to provide for the pay of committee clerks. Under the existing appropriation bill there are only twenty-one clerks provided for; and some question has arisen whether the fund that is provided is applicable to the payment of the clerks under the assignment made by the Committee of Accounts and approved by the House.

Mr. CONGER. The resolution had better go to the Committee of Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposed the resolution was from the Committee of Accounts, the gentleman from Maryland who offered it being the chairman of that committee.

Mr. CONGER. The Committee of Accounts desires to have supervision of the expenditure of the House accounts, and I think it proper, whether the resolution comes from its chairman or anybody else, that it should have the sanction of that committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Maryland that the Committee of Accounts have leave to report at any time.

Mr. CONGER. Let it be referred to them, and they can report it to-morrow.

Mr. HENRY. Very well.

The resolution was referred to the Committee of Accounts.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COFFROTH. I suggest that the House take a recess until to-morrow at eleven o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks leave to submit some requests to the House.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MASON, indefinitely, on account of sickness; and

To Mr. LADD, for ten days, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. BREWER, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Joseph W. Seeley, Frederick Carlisle, John Barton, William A. Morse, Wellington V. Heusted, and Frederick C. Dunker; there being no adverse report thereon.

On motion of Mr. LORING, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Annie D. Rundlett; there being no adverse report thereon.

REFRIGERATING SHIPS FOR DISINFECTING PURPOSES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, suggesting an amendment to the bill authorizing the construction of refrigerating ships for the disinfection of vessels and cargoes; which was referred to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 8, 1879.

SIR: In reference to Senate bill No 55, which has been brought before the House of Representatives, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to contract for the construction of a refrigerating ship for the disinfection of vessels and cargoes, I have the honor to suggest that it be amended, in lines 10 and 11, by striking out the words "an officer of the Bureau of Steam Engineering of the Navy," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "a naval constructor and a chief engineer of the Navy in their respective departments," as it seems to me that both a constructor and an engineer should be detailed to superintend the construction of such a vessel.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. W. THOMPSON,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

MISSISSIPPI JETTY WORKS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from Captain James B. Eads in reference to the progress of the Mississippi jetty works.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, April 18, 1879.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith for the information of Congress a communication from Captain James B. Eads, dated the 8th instant, and a report from the Acting Chief of Engineers thereon, dated 15th instant, in reference to the progress of the Mississippi River jetty works and in regard to the propriety of forthwith securing congressional action to insure prompt payment of any and all lawful demands on account of said works.

Although a question is pending in the Treasury Department as to whether any money is available for further payment to Captain Eads of such demands, and an opinion will probably be rendered by the Attorney-General at an early date on the questions raised by the Acting Chief of Engineers, yet I deem it proper to invite the attention of Congress to this matter without further delay.

In order to remove all doubts concerning funds available to meet all proper obligations in this connection, I recommend that Congress appropriate the requisite amount of money to pay said Eads, or his legal representatives; otherwise, under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1875, if Congress shall have failed to appropriate the money, Captain Eads may claim payment in 5 per cent. bonds, and I submit herewith the draught of a bill, which, if passed, will doubtless accomplish the objects in view.

Very respectfully,

GEO. W. McCRARY,
Secretary of War.

To the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

An act making appropriations for constructing jetties and other works at South Pass Mississippi River.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the requisite amount is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay all money that may become due and owing to James B. Eads and his associates, or that may become payable to said Eads, his assigns or legal representatives, in accordance with the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1875, and the acts amendatory thereof, and to continue the monthly payments in the manner and to the full extent of the amount specified in the act approved June 19, 1878, chapter 313, Statutes at Large.

The SPEAKER. The letter will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations if there be no objection.

Mr. REAGAN. I think it should go to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONGER. The letter refers entirely to the subject of the bonds authorized by a former law of Congress.

Mr. REAGAN. The subject I know was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and the act of 1878 and 1879 was reported from that committee.

Mr. CONGER. This relates to the appropriation of money under existing law.

Mr. ATKINS. The subject has been before the Committee on Appropriations once or twice. It is simply a question whether the appropriation shall be made or whether failing to make the appropriation the payment shall be made to Captain Eads on his bond.

Mr. CONGER. It has no connection with the work or its superintendence.

Mr. REAGAN. The Committee on Appropriations would have the privilege of reporting at any time, but the Committee on Commerce has not. But the act of 1875 and all the acts relating to the subject have been acted on by the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if the communication be in relation to a change of the original act, then it properly belongs to the Committee on Commerce, but the Chair does not so understand.

The communication was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. BROWNE. Before a motion is made to adjourn I desire to make a suggestion to the House. It has been determined that the debate upon the pending bill shall close next Friday. There are many gentlemen who desire to be heard, and it will be impossible for them to have a hearing unless the House consents to hold night sessions next week on the nights intervening between this and the day fixed for the close of the discussion. I hope, therefore, that the House will consent that we may have sessions on each night of next week, to give those an opportunity to talk who are willing to come here and talk, even to empty benches.

Unfortunately I have not had an opportunity to say anything upon this subject, and may not have one unless the House kindly consents that I may come here some time next week at night. I make the motion with the distinct understanding that no business will be transacted at these evening sessions and that they shall be for debate only.

The SPEAKER. On what evenings does the gentleman propose that these sessions shall be had?

Mr. BROWNE. I would suggest each evening, on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday. I speak at the instance of quite a number of gentlemen who will have no opportunity of being heard unless they have the indulgence of the House, and certainly those old members who particularly have opportunity to obtain the floor will give this indulgence to modest gentlemen who have not had the pleasure of serving their constituencies heretofore.

Mr. PRICE. Where are they?

Mr. NEW. I desire to concur in the suggestion and request made by my colleague. I have not been able to get my name on any list and I will not get it upon the list on the pending bill. I could not get it on the list on the bill which has just passed the House, and unless some such opportunity is given I shall have no opportunity to be heard.

I will say to those who do not want to come that they can have the opportunity to retire to their boarding-houses.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] asks that an order be passed that the House on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday may take a recess from half past four o'clock p. m. to half past seven o'clock p. m., the evening sessions being for debate only and no business except debate be transacted at the evening sessions.

There was no objection, and Mr. BROWNE's motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROWNE. Would that cut off a motion to adjourn at half past four o'clock if the motion were made?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had better leave that open; it is hardly likely that this order will be interfered with, but in the event that it is hardly necessary to have a session the House might desire to adjourn. The gentleman had better leave it within the power of the House to do so.

Mr. WHITE. How will it be in respect to the list that has been made out of speakers on these evenings?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has nothing to do with the list; that belongs to the chairman of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WHITE. I understand that; will the order of debate at night sessions be followed according to the list?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to answer any questions touching a matter of business in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BROWNE. I am authorized to say that the list will not be followed.

Mr. PRICE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty-eight minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio: The petition of Thomas L. Young, (accompanied by draught of bill,) for the retirement of Brevet Major-General William H. French, colonel Fourth Artillery, United States Army, late major-general of volunteers, with the rank and pay of a brigadier-general—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, the petition of Thomas L. Young, (accompanied by a draught of bill,) for the relief of William G. Halpine on account of loss of horse and baggage while serving in the United States Army in 1862 and 1863—to the same committee.

Also, the petition of Thomas L. Young, (accompanied by draught of bill,) that the Enterprise Fire and Marine Company of Cincinnati, Ohio, be paid the amount of tax overpaid by said company on the 25th of March, 1867, to the collector of internal revenue for the first district of Ohio—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of Thomas L. Young, (accompanied by draught of bill,) that a pension be granted Valentine Rapp—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 19, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

JOURNAL—PETITIONS.

The Journal of yesterday was read, closing with the list of petitions introduced and the references made of them.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to call the attention of the Chair and of the House to the somewhat novel feature connected with the reading of the Journal this morning. I believe we have never before had read at the Clerk's desk, as a part of the Journal, the list of petitions presented through the petition-box and the references made of them. I hope it will not pass into a precedent, for the reason that sometimes the reading of the petitions would consume perhaps an entire hour. If it becomes a part of the rule, or of the practice, that the list of petitions is to be read as a portion of the Journal, it may very seriously cripple our legislative work, because without unanimous consent the reading of no portion of the Journal can be omitted. I do not know but what if the claim should be insisted upon one might demand that the body of the petition be read.

Under the rules and our practice the Speaker is required to examine and correct the Journal before it is read. He is required to examine by themselves the petitions which have been presented. This would indicate that the examination of petitions is a different thing from the examination of the Journal. The duties enjoined upon the Speaker by the rules seem to be divided into two separate parts; the one, the examination of the petitions as placed in the box for the purpose of calling the attention of the House, it may be, to any that may have been improperly referred; and the other, an examination of the Journal of the proceedings of the House. It occurs to me that that must necessarily mean that they are two separate things; that petitions are not properly included in the Journal, or else the duties of the Speaker would not be divided in that way.

I raise this point at this time, not because I have personally any objection to the reading of what has been read, but because, if it shall pass into a precedent, I think we will find ourselves greatly embarrassed. Suppose that a number of members here desire to delay legislation, they could file an unusual number of petitions, which would have to be journalized, and then the next day the list would have to be read, unless there was unanimous consent to omit the reading.

I therefore make this suggestion and desire to inquire of the Chair whether he has had the list of petitions read as a part of the Journal for some special purpose, or is it designed as the introduction of a new method of keeping the Journal?

The SPEAKER. The Chair since Monday last has examined the Journal each day so far as related to the petitions put into the petition-box, which was never the practice before that time. Since the Chair adopted this plan of examination the statement has been made here in the House by members that the House had no opportunity of knowing what reference had been made of petitions and no opportunity to correct any improper reference that might have been made of the petitions and memorials placed in the petition-box.

The Chair therefore thought that during the period of the controversy as to the introduction of bills the better plan in order to save every possible objection was to cause the list of petitions and memorials with their references to be read so that the House as well as the Chair might have an opportunity of judging as to the propriety of the reference.

During the present week the Chair has caused several changes to be made in the reference of petitions and memorials accompanied by bills. The effect has been to bring about controversies between members and the Chair as to the propriety of the change of reference, the Chair assuming that the reference should be to one committee, while the member thought that perhaps it should be to another committee. In all cases of a difference of opinion like that the Chair would prefer that the House should determine. It is for that reason that the Chair has caused the Journal to be read in the manner it has been read this morning. The rule also states that petitions put into the box shall be entered upon the Journal.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Chair will remember that in the Digest of the Rules and Practice of the House it is stated, on page 234:

Since the rule authorizing the presentation of petitions in the House has been rescinded, that portion of the Journal which contains the record of petitions handed to the Clerk is never read, but is published.

The SPEAKER. That statement is made in reference to a different condition of things than seems to the Chair to exist at this time.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the Chair will allow me——

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will submit this motion, that the question of having read as a part of the Journal by the Clerk the list of petitions presented and referred through the petition-box be referred to the Committee on Rules for report; and that in the mean time the reading of such list be not considered obligatory upon the Speaker or the Clerk, or as required by the rule. My motion is that this subject, without prejudice to the merits or the result as to how it shall come out, be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will see that when these petitions are read as part of the Journal and prior to the approval of the Journal, the opportunity is presented to any member, if he wishes, to raise the question whether memorials and petitions accompanied by bills are properly referred. The complaint was made in the House the other day that the House never had an opportunity to review the references of these bills so referred. The Chair intended, and only intended, that such a criticism should no longer be made.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think that matter could be corrected with a great deal less trouble to the House by allowing members to raise the question of reference when the memorials appear in print in the RECORD, as they usually do every morning. We have now on our desks, and we ordinarily have every morning, a printed statement in the RECORD of the references which have been made. We could adopt a rule that if during the day when the memorials appear in print in the RECORD any gentleman chooses to raise the question of reference he can do so.

The SPEAKER. That would be a remedy; but that has never been understood to be the privilege of a member.

Mr. GARFIELD. Well, I think it would be far better for the business of the House to adopt such a rule than to consume time by the reading of these petitions or memorials every morning as a part of the Journal. If there be no objection, I hope my motion to refer this subject to the Committee on Rules will be adopted.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. A petition, under the rule, is deposited in the box, and the reference desired is indicated upon it by the party depositing the petition. Now, when does that reference actually take place?

The SPEAKER. It should take place the next morning. The petitions are distributed by the petition clerk to the committees to which the references have been made. That has been done heretofore on the morning following the presentation of the petition; but it has not been done since Tuesday last; for the Chair has retained quite a number of these papers with a view of consulting members as to such reference when he thought an improper reference was indorsed thereon. Thus the distribution of them by the petition clerk to the several committees has been delayed.

Mr. FRYE. Now, suppose when the Journal is read I find that a certain petition has been referred to a certain committee. It has not been referred by my vote; I have not voted either in the majority or in the minority upon the question. Is it in my power then to make a motion to reconsider that reference?

The SPEAKER. In point of fact the petition is not technically referred until the Journal is approved; and that is the reason the Chair proposes to give to every member the opportunity to test the sense of the House upon the question whether any bill referred in this way has been improperly referred.

Mr. FRYE. Then I desire to call the attention of the Speaker to this question: how shall the House, or any member, have knowledge of the proper reference? For instance, I find among the petitions as printed in to-day's RECORD the following:

By Mr. KETCHAM: The petition of Charles Spencer, a United States soldier, for pay for clothing lost by fire in the camp—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Now, how does the House know whether this was a loss caused by "fire in the camp" during the war, and is thus a war claim, which, under the rules, must be referred to the Committee on War-Claims, or whether it is a claim arising long since the war, and consequently not a war claim.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can find that out when the Journal is read by asking the member who presented the petition its substance, if doubt exists. This is the object of the Chair: that opportunity shall be given to any member to find out the reference and test the question whether a bill has been properly referred, bills not having been heretofore referred in this way.

Mr. FRYE. Then I desire to call the Speaker's attention to two or three of these petitions. Here, for instance, are papers presented by my colleague [Mr. LADD] "relating to the claim of Dr. S. S. M. Doak for services as an assistant surgeon in the United States Army," which are referred to the Committee of Claims. Now, if this is a war claim, it certainly should go to the Committee on War Claims. Then here is the next one:

Papers relating to the claim of George Conway, for compensation for property lost while in the service of the Government.

That sounds like a war claim, but it is referred to the Committee of Claims. Then here is a petition presented by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. MARTIN:]

The petition of Mrs. A. P. Bell, postmaster Bertie, North Carolina, (accompanied by draught of a bill,) that she be paid the amount of money belonging to the Government, and of post-office money orders, destroyed by fire—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Now it has been the universal custom in this House to refer petitions and bills of this description to the Committee of Claims.

Then I find that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] presented the "petition of W. G. Adkisson, for pay for a horse lost in the Mexican war," which was referred to the Committee of Claims. Clearly this should have gone to the Committee on War Claims. Then there is a petition presented by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. YOUNG:]

The petition of Thomas L. Young, (accompanied by a draught of bill,) for the relief of William G. Halpine on account of loss of horse and baggage while serving in the United States Army in 1862 and 1863.

This is referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, though it is clearly a war claim, and should have been referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The SPEAKER. The advantage of correcting at this stage of the proceedings any improper references is that it saves the committees to which papers are improperly referred the necessity of coming back into the House and asking to be relieved from the consideration of such papers and that they be referred to some other committee. This during the course of the session is being constantly done.

Mr. FRYE. But, Mr. Speaker, after the rule gives the supervision of these petitions to the Speaker, is it necessary for members to go over this list and pick out, as I have done, petition after petition, and then make a motion for reconsideration, or something of that kind, in order that the reference may be changed and the papers referred to the proper committees?

The SPEAKER. If the Journal when read is not correct it ought to be corrected, and if a bill is improperly referred in the Journal that reference should be changed before the Journal is approved.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the Chair will allow me, it is not a question of the correctness of the Journal, because the Journal does state correctly what reference has been made. I could not rise and say the Journal was not correct. In all the cases referred to by the gentleman from Maine the Journal is correct, for it tells what has been done. The objection is to the references themselves.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has fulfilled his duty under the rule.

Mr. GARFIELD. It occurs to me there are two or three ways in which we can correct it. It has just occurred to me we might have a committee on reference of petitions, to which all these papers should be referred, to order, on their responsibility as a committee, the proper references, and thus save the Speaker from the laborious and somewhat difficult duty now imposed upon him. That could be done. If the practice of having all these petitions go upon the Journal should prevail, then I have undoubtedly the right to call for their reading as a part of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did this only to meet the objection raised upon the floor that the House had no opportunity to test the question as to the reference of these petitions.

Mr. GARFIELD. I can understand the Chair's motive, and he ought to be protected. The new phase which matters have taken has imposed upon the Chair a duty alike burdensome and difficult. What I would suggest is that the whole subject be referred to the Committee on Rules to devise some proper method of avoiding the whole trouble which has come upon us in this new mode of procedure. I hope my motion will prevail.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would take two hours each morning of the time of the Speaker to read and make the proper reference of these petitions. In the judgment of the Chair this duty should be performed by the Clerk of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think that is asking too much of a person who is not a member of this body.

The SPEAKER. But the Clerk has the records as to past references in kindred cases and what references like petitions have taken.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is the reason I wish the whole subject referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to ask the Speaker another question. This has grown up from the fact that on last Monday opportunity was not afforded to gentlemen to present bills in the ordinary way for reference to appropriate committees, so that when the bills were before the House reference could be intelligently made. Now, suppose the Speaker should find on next Monday, as he is very likely to do, there is no further objection to gentlemen on the other side of the House putting in any bill, no matter how absurd and wicked, and having it referred to a committee—suppose there is no further opposition to that being done, will the Speaker then feel under the necessity of requiring the petitions to be journalized during the remaining portion of this Congress?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be guided by the wish of the House in every respect. The contingency mentioned by the gentleman from Maine as likely to occur will of course lessen the duty of the Chair.

Mr. STEPHENS. Let the whole subject go to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. Perhaps the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio is the proper one.

Mr. CONGER. I think the entire trouble would be avoided if the Committee on Rules should report a rule forbidding the presentation of petitions by placing them in the petition-box. That would be a simple and direct way of avoiding what otherwise, if this practice should continue, will take up much of the time of the House every morning.

The SPEAKER. And the Committee on Rules might provide a time which could not be interfered with when each and every member might have the unquestioned right to present bills and petitions for reference.

Mr. CONGER. All that could be taken into consideration by the committee, and of course proper representations would be made by those interested in the subject.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to have referred at the same time to the Committee on Rules the resolution offered by me the other morning, to which no objection was made, providing that resolutions calling for information from the several Departments shall be provided for under the rules, so that they may be offered and disposed of without delay.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to that going to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the reference will be made to the Committee on Rules as suggested.

The Journal was then approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On motion of Mr. HAYES, by unanimous consent, Mr. THOMAS was granted leave of absence for this day on account of sickness.

SUBSIDIARY SILVER COIN.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twenty-six minutes to one o'clock.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call up the unfinished business of the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business in the morning hour is the bill (H. R. No. 4) to provide for the interchange of subsidiary coins for legal-tender money under certain circumstances, and to make such coins a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $10; on which the gentleman from Ohio on the right [Mr. WARNER] is entitled to the floor. After the disposition of this business, the business alluded to by the gentleman from Ohio on the left [Mr. GARFIELD] will come up.

Mr. WARNER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio to offer his resolution if he desires.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman yields, I will call up the resolution in reference to the distribution of documents.

Mr. WARNER. With the understanding that it is not to consume any time.

Mr. STEPHENS. I only consent if it does not come out of the morning hour. I want to get through with the pending business.

Mr. GARFIELD. It would probably have to come out of the morning hour.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then waive the consideration of your resolution till we get through with this bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well.

Mr. WARNER. I am directed by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures to offer an amendment to section 3, which I ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] to accept, to strike out all after the word "payment" and substitute "of all dues public and private."

Mr. GARFIELD. We have not got down to that yet. We are now on the first section.

Mr. WARNER. Let the amendment come in in its order, then. Section 3529 of the Revised Statutes provides that coins of nickel, bronze, and copper may be redeemed by the Treasurer of the United States when presented in sums of not less than $20. Section 3527 of the Revised Statutes provides that fractional silver coins, or silver coins less than $1, other than the trade-dollars, may be paid out of the Treasury to any extent. That, however, has been modified by subsequent acts. Under the act of 1876, section 3, silver coins of smaller denominations than $1 may be paid out from the Treasury in exchange for legal-tender money without limit, up to fifty millions; but there is no provision whereby subsidiary silver coins—using the word "subsidiary" to mean silver coins of less denominations than $1—can be exchanged at the option of the holder for full tender money.

This was evidently an omission in the law providing for fractional currency. The object of this bill is simply to make our currency more homogeneous, to unify it, by providing that these coins of less denominations than $1, when they accumulate in the course of retail trade at any center, may be exchanged at the Treasury or any subtreasury or depository for full legal-tender money. The bill also provides that the legal-tender limit of our subsidiary silver shall be changed from $5 to $10. In England, fractional coins are legal tender for £2 or $10. So throughout the States composing the Latin union, all divisional coins, as they are there called, are legal tender for fifty francs, or about $10, the same as is proposed in this bill for our subsidiary silver coins.

At the limit at which these coins are a legal tender, Mr. Speaker, it is proposed to make them exchangeable for lawful money, and thus to unify our whole currency. I submit that that is as it should be. It practically gives to all our subsidiary coins the effect of full-tender money; and I think gentlemen on the other side can hardly take exceptions to a provision that would thus unify and make homogeneous our currency and enable those who are compelled to take these coins as legal tender in retail trade, when they gather in large quantities, to turn them over to the Treasury, as the common reservoir whence they may be redistributed to other parts of the country where needed.

Mr. STEPHENS. I think the modification suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] accomplishes the original object of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures quite as well as if the House should adopt the language of the clause as it now stands. I want a vote on this bill speedily, and I intend to ask the previous question. I have stated that amendments may be offered to each section, and that they may be offered by general consent after the previous question has been ordered by the House.

Now, sir, upon the subject of currency and our silver coins generally, I have a few remarks to make. I wish that I had more than five minutes to make them in. The general opinion of the House seems to be that the subsidiary coin is nothing but fractional silver coins for small change. The truth is the fractional or subsidiary coins, so called, is a debased currency. It is true the term "subsidiary" did not get into the law, but that is the name by which this kind of coins is known. The term comes from the word "subside," to sink, to lower, to degrade, to debase. Our half dollars and quarter dollars are not only fractional, but debased coins.

Our country to-day presents the strange spectacle of having three separate, distinct, silver coins, no two of them of the same value: the trade-dollar of 420 grains of standard silver; the standard silver dollar of 412½ grains of like standard; and the fractional coins, consisting of halves, quarters, and dimes, are only 385.80 grains of standard silver. Two of our silver halves or four of the quarters or ten of the dimes are 26.70 grains short. They are all, therefore, debased coins. That, sir, is all wrong. It is not right; it is not just. Its evil falls most heavily upon labor, upon the toiling poor. The loss on every one of these fractional silver coins is over 6 per cent.

These great evils I do not propose now to touch. I want the House to pass this bill as the first step of reform, and then proceed afterward to other measures. There is a demand for the passage of this bill all over the country. Let us pass it and let us hereafter take up these other and graver matters. I will not at this time pursue the discussion further.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will not move the previous question until I have an opportunity of offering an amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS. The understanding was that after the previous question was ordered amendments may be offered, submitted, and voted on.

Mr. MILLS. I will state to the gentleman from Georgia that I desire to submit a substitute for the bill, and I would like to be heard on it for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the agreement to be, that the bill shall be considered by sections under the five-minute rule, and that it shall be open to amendment.

Now, if the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] desires to demand the previous question and test the sense of the House thereon, it would be better that the various amendments to the several sections should be submitted now, rather than after the previous question has been seconded.

Mr. STEPHENS. Let them be submitted now.

Mr. MILLS. I offer what I send to the Clerk's desk as a substitute for the entire bill.

The Clerk read the substitute, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

SEC. 1. That of the silver coins, the one dollar shall be of the weight of 412½ grains; the half dollar of the weight of 206¼ grains; the quarter dollar of the weight of 103⅛ grains; the dime or tenth part of a dollar of a weight of 41¼ grains; the half dime or twentieth part of a dollar of a weight of 20⅝ grains; and that dollars, half dollars, quarter dollars, dimes, and half dimes shall be a legal tender of payment, according to their nominal value, for any sum whatever.

SEC. 2. That the holder of any of the silver coins of the United States that are now or may hereafter be coined may, on presentation of the same in sums of $10, or any multiple thereof, at the office of the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, receive therefor United States legal-tender money.

SEC. 3. That the holder of any of the 420-grain dollars of the United States, or of any Mexican dollars containing more than 417 grains of standard silver and more than 377 grains of pure silver, may, on presentation of the same in any sum not less than $10 at the office of the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, receive therefor United States legal-tender money.

SEC. 4. That any holder of silver bullion or other foreign coin than that hereinbefore mentioned, in any quantity, shall receive for each 371¼ grains of fine silver $1 of United States legal-tender money.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to have all foreign coins coming into the Treasury, and all bullion, and all subsidiary coins of the United States below the standard prescribed in the first section of this act, sent to the mints and recoined into pieces of the standard weight prescribed in the same.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby ordered and directed to apply all the said legal-tender silver coins in the Treasury of the United States, or that may hereafter come into the same, first, to the payment of the interest on the bonds of the United States; second, to the payment of the principal of such bonds as are due and shall become due; third, for the purchase of such bonds as may not be due.

SEC. 7. In exchanging United States legal-tender money for silver the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to pay out notes of the denomination of one and two dollars till he shall have paid out the sum of $50,000,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to offer an amendment to the first section. I approve of the purpose of this bill. It was evidently an omission of the law, and not an intentional omission, that there is no provision in the statute by which a glut of fractional silver coin can be disposed of where it has accumulated unduly. The trouble is not, however, with the individual people; they have no such trouble. The trouble is where these silver coins accumulate—on street railways, in banks, and ferries, or places where payments are made in small sums. There there is an accumulation of this coin, and that accumulation not only works hardship there, but helps to keep this currency away from the ordinary circulation among the people.

It ought to be arranged by law that when it has accumulated in such places it shall be sent to the Treasury to be distributed to the people, so as to keep it in circulation. I agree cordially to the general object of the bill; my objections are to minor points. In the first place, I think it is a mistake to have the limitation of exchange so low down as $10. We find that the trouble is, the glut of this silver coin in the classes of business I have spoken of. They can just as well send $100 of this silver as $10.

It is not wise to authorize by law the sending of these small packages, burdening the Treasury, increasing the business and increasing the risk very much. The Secretary of the Treasury himself suggests that the limit ought to be $100, so that persons having this fractional currency may send it in amounts of $100 and upward. I think, however, it might be convenient to say $50. I move, as an amendment, to strike out the word "ten," in line 5, and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifty."

Mr. STEPHENS. I have no objection in the world to that; let us put it at $50 instead of $10.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think it would be unwise to make it smaller. In line 7, in order to make the bill conform to our statutes, I think we ought not to import new terms. We ought to keep to the old terms. We do not want to say "shall receive legal-tender money;" that money is known as the "lawful money" of the United States. That is the language employed in the statute and it covers the point, and wherever it occurs let us keep to the accredited words of the law.

I now turn for a moment to another word that has crept into the preamble of the bill and into the third section—the word "subsidiary" coins. I think that should be stricken out. It is unnecessary. The law now recognizes the minor coinage, the copper and nickel coins, but nowhere have we the word "subsidiary" coinage, and we ought not to multiply terms. Let this coinage be equal to silver coins of a less denomination than $1; that is perfectly described within the law, and use no new terms which might muddle the minds of the people who would not know the difference between subsidiary and minor coinage.

The most serious objection I have to the bill is to the third section. I do not think we ought to change the amount for which fractional silver is a legal tender. I hope it will remain at $5.

With these amendments I am heartily in favor of the bill; but I move to strike out the third section.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. MILLS. Do I understand that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] allows five minutes each to discuss amendments?

Mr. HAWLEY. I desire to raise the point of order on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS.] It seems to me that it is not germane to the bill. It proposes a complete reorganization of the subsidiary coinage, and it strikes me that it is not germane.

The SPEAKER. The amendment came in without objection.

Mr. STEPHENS. I hope that we shall have a vote upon it.

The SPEAKER. Amendments were allowed to be offered; and at the time this amendment was offered no point of order was made.

Mr. HAWLEY. I had no opportunity to make the point of order any earlier, for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] took the floor for debate.

The SPEAKER. A point of order will take any member off the floor.

Mr. HAWLEY. I confess I was not aware that I could interrupt the gentleman from Ohio by a point of order. Does the Speaker overrule the point of order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not overrule it; the Chair thinks it was not made at the proper time.

Mr. REED. I hope the Chair will not come to that conclusion, because these amendments were presented all together and really no opportunity was allowed to make points of order. I think that when amendments are presented in this fashion——

Mr. MILLS. It is too late to make a point of order after an amendment has been received and discussed.

Mr. REED. The Speaker ought to allow the largest latitude in that regard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair always has.

Mr. GARFIELD. I thought the amendment was read for information.

The SPEAKER. It was read as an amendment pending, and then was the time to make the point of order. The Chair does not overrule the point of order, and does not say what he would have ruled had the point of order been made in time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I thought the Chair ruled that the first section of the bill was pending. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] had a proposition which could be in order only at the end of the reading of the bill. I took it that the amendment was read for information as to what he desired to do when it should be in order, which would be at the end of the reading of the bill. I certainly should have made the point of order at the time if I had not supposed that the amendment was read merely for information. I confined my remarks to the first section of the bill.

Mr. MILLS. It is a rule of law, which will apply, I suppose, to parliamentary assemblies as well as to courts of justice, that the law favors the vigilant, and not the man who sleeps upon his rights. There is a time when a point of order can be properly made. If not made at that time the law would say that the man should not be presumed to have spoken when he was silent. In this case that time has passed. If the member having the right to make the point of order does not make it at the proper time, then he yields the point of order.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I make the point of order that the first section of the bill only is now under consideration.

Mr. HAWLEY. I was about to say that I supposed the first section of the bill was under consideration for amendment and five-minute debate. The gentleman from Texas offered a proposition, which was read, I supposed, rather for information, and which is really a substitute for the entire bill. I think that is another point of order.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS,] as a substitute for the whole bill, would not come up for action until after the House had disposed of the amendments which have been offered to perfect the original text.

Mr. REED. And the point of order would not lie upon the amendment until it came up in that way.

The SPEAKER. It was allowed to come in as an amendment pending.

Mr. REED. I do not think the House so understood it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not going to take advantage of any one nor allow any advantage to be taken.

Mr. REED. Certainly; that is what I supposed.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] proposed to call the previous question. I made the point that we were now considering the bill by sections under the five-minute rule, and therefore that the previous question should not be moved until we had gone through all the sections of the bill. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] submitted an amendment which I supposed was read for information only, because I immediately proceeded to offer an amendment to the first section of the bill and to debate it. I should have raised the point of order upon his amendment if I had supposed or understood that it was then submitted.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I ask the ruling of the Chair on my point of order that we are now considering the first section only.

Mr. MILLS. When I present my amendment the rules of the House require that gentlemen should make their points of order upon it. If they do not then speak, when the rules require them to speak, the Chair cannot extend equity to them to my disadvantage. I hope the Chair will rule that the gentleman has lost his opportunity to make the point of order on my amendment.

Mr. SAMFORD. The Speaker in response to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] said that the substitute might come in after the bill had been perfected. The gentleman then replied that he would have it read so that it should come in in its order. I did not understand that it was subject to a point of order at that time.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] or the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] or the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SAMFORD] understands the matter in that way, the Chair will not take any advantage by reason of a misapprehension.

Mr. WARNER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is substantially correct. When I proposed to submit my amendment I did so not thinking that we were then considering only the first section of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] to confirm the position taken by his colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. WARNER. That is my understanding of it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will allow the amendment to be considered as subject to a point of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. What is the understanding?

The SPEAKER. That the amendment was read for information.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Why, the gentleman from Texas offered it in good faith as an amendment to the bill.

Mr. MILLS. Was it not the understanding that before the previous question should be moved all amendments that were to be voted on should be offered? In accordance with this understanding I have offered the amendment; and if any gentleman in this House has been derelict in his attention to his duties here he must not plead that as any reason why I should not have the advantage of my rights under the rules. When the Chair extends such indulgence to him he extends it to my disadvantage and in derogation of my rights.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. MILLS. Well, I think so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, on a disputed understanding of the situation of a question, is not willing to deprive any member of a right to raise a point of order against an amendment allowed to be offered.

Mr. SPRINGER. I should like to have read the amendment which I send to the desk, so that it may be considered as pending.

Mr. STEPHENS. I yield to the gentleman to have his amendment read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 3 by inserting for the word "coin," in the second line, the words "and trade-dollars."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] submit that as an amendment to the first section?

Mr. SPRINGER. To the third section.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that the bill be taken up by sections, as originally proposed by the gentleman from Georgia, and that amendments be offered to each section as it is taken up. That is the more intelligent method of proceeding.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have amendments pending to the first section.

The SPEAKER. The first section will be read.

Mr. REAGAN. Will this arrangement exclude the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. MILLS] as a substitute?

The SPEAKER. It does not exclude it, but it gives the right to any member to raise a point of order on it.

Mr. GARFIELD. There are now two amendments pending to the first section.

Mr. STEPHENS. Let the first section be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] desires, as the Chair understands, to present a substitute for the entire bill; but the first proceeding should be to perfect the text of the bill.

Mr. MILLS. Is the bill open to debate?

The SPEAKER. It is, of course.

Mr. STEPHENS. I have the floor. If the gentleman from Texas wants to speak, I yield to him.

Mr. MILLS. I hope that this bill will be defeated because I can see no possible good in it, but a great deal of evil. I can see no reason why the subsidiary silver coins of the United States should be restricted in their debt-paying power (which gives it its chief function of value to the people) to $10. We might as well abandon the whole question, and surrender the whole demand of the people for the free coinage of silver to enable them to pay their debts, to exchange the products of their labor, to elevate the value of their property, as to say that we will coin silver but will withhold from it its function of money. I understand this to be the question which we have been debating, and the real issue which has been agitating the popular mind for the last two or three years.

Why have the people demanded the unlimited coinage of silver if silver is not to be used as money? What advantage are they to derive from it? If they cannot compel their creditors to accept it in payment of their debts it may as well remain in the mines.

To what extent has the silver coins the debt-paying power in this country? How many standard dollars have been coined since the foundation of the Government? Out of $180,000,000 of silver coined by the mints of the United States only eight million standard silver dollars have been coined. If they are all in existence now, that is all the full legal-tender silver we have, except the recent coinage. How disproportionate the amount of silver dollars coined at your mints as compared with the fractional silver currency! It is the fractional silver currency that constitutes the body of your silver money; $109,000,000 in half-dollar pieces and $27,000,000 in twenty-five-cent pieces were coined where you coined only $8,000,000 in dollar pieces. Yet now gentlemen come before the Congress of the United States and propose that this subsidiary coinage, constituting the vast body of our silver money, shall have debt-paying power to the amount of $10 only. What is the difference between such a provision and that of the act of 1873, which has brought down from the people of the United States such a storm of indignation? Only the sum of $5; that is all. Fractional silver currency is a legal tender now to the amount of $5, and you propose graciously to extend its legal-tender quality to $10!

The people of the United States demand that their silver coin shall be raised from the degraded position in which it is placed to-day and that it shall have equally with gold the debt-paying power, that they may be enabled to take themselves out of the jaws of the sharks who now prey upon them. And you propose to give ten dollars' worth of relief to a people oppressed with twenty hundred millions of indebtedness. You neutralize the whole silver of the country. I propose in the substitute, which it seems we are not to have the privilege of voting for, to bring back the coinage of the subsidiary silver of the country to where it was in 1837, to make all your coins of full weight, the dollar of 371¼ grains of pure silver—of 412½ grains of standard silver, and the half dollar of half of that amount, and the quarter dollar of quarter of that amount, and the dime of one-tenth of that amount, and to make the whole, as our fathers made it, a legal tender in payment of all debts to any amount, public and private. Then your silver will come up and gold will fall down. Why? Because the demand for gold ceases just in proportion as silver is put into business channels to contend with it in supplying the demand for money. Then silver will be applied to the payment of the bonded indebtedness of the United States and help to relieve the people of the hundred millions of taxation now imposed to pay interest on that debt every year.

Let me ask where are the silver dollars which were coined under the silver act of two years ago? Who sees them in circulation? The half dollars are in circulation because they are not legal-tenders, but where are the dollars?

Mr. WARNER. Let me ask the gentleman from Texas where are the half dollars and quarter dollars coined prior to 1854?

Mr. MILLS. They have all sunk out of sight. When cheaper money came into circulation it became the medium of exchange, in obedience to that law that the cheaper money of a country always transacts its business and the dearer money passes into the coffers or out into foreign countries, where it is worth more. There is where the silver has gone. When we remonetized silver two years ago Mexican dollars and old silver dollars of this country came out of their hiding-places once more. I was told by the Director of the Mint that there came into circulation silver dollars nearly a hundred years old when remonetization took place. Then silver currency was once more resurrected and is in circulation now.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. HASKELL,] in his remarks on Thursday last, claimed that the bill now before the House was in the interest of banks and bankers of the large cities and towns. I beg leave to differ with the honorable gentleman. I believe the bill is in the interest of the people of the United States; in the interest of every man, woman, and child possessed of a single piece of fractional coin. The accumulations of these coins are purchased by bullion dealers at a discount and resold by them at an advance or paid out in small sums at par. The Government issues these coins at par and should, in my judgment, redeem them at par. Unless so redeemed and the Government continues to issue them, it is inevitable they will sooner or later pass at their bullion value, which is even less than that of the legal-tender silver dollar of 412½ grains, the present bullion value of which is about eighty-three cents.

I agree with the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] that it is against the dignity and honor of this Government to maintain these coins in circulation without providing for their redemption. This bill provides for such redemption, and will, I hope, be passed by this House.

Mr. STEPHENS. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, only a few words in reply to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS.] This bill does not restrain or restrict the present debt-paying power of these fractional silver coins. It enlarges it. It is true that it does not enlarge it to the extent that I would wish; but, nevertheless, it is a step in the right direction. The fractional silver coins now are a legal tender and have the debt-paying power only for $5. This bill extends it to $10.

I have already said that if I had my way I would put all the fractional silver coins of this country upon an equality with the standard silver dollars. That is, two halves, and four quarters, and ten dimes should, respectively, contain 412½ grains of standard silver. I would have no discrimination or differences in the silver coins of the country. At some future day, and at an early day, too, I trust to be able to introduce a bill equalizing the silver coins of the country. But certainly this bill is in the right direction as far as it goes. I wished barely to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Texas that it limited the debt-paying power of fractional silver coins. It enlarges it; it doubles it. I would make it ten-fold more; but now I take what I can get. The majority of the House and of the country seem to demand this.

One word in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] When he suggested his amendment of "fifty" instead of "ten," I thought it applied to the third section, and intimated I was willing to do that. I now prefer the bill to stand as it is.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question, and after it has been seconded, by general consent, the debate may go on. I do it now in order to have the main question ordered in the morning hour.

Mr. CHALMERS. Let the amendments be printed.

Mr. STEPHENS. Very well; and the vote can be taken on Tuesday next.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not see how the gentleman can ask the previous question on the whole bill and amendments, because we have not yet reached the second section.

Mr. STEPHENS. There will be no objection to allowing amendments to be offered in their order.

Mr. REAGAN. Let it cover the whole bill.

The SPEAKER. It will cover the first section unless the gentleman moves the previous question to the whole bill.

Mr. STEPHENS. What I propose is that the general debate go on under the five-minute rule, and that when the question next comes up the bill shall be taken up by sections and every amendment voted on in its order, down to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS.]

Mr. EWING. And any amendment that may be offered meanwhile.

Mr. STEPHENS. Yes; in their order.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Do I understand there can be debate after the previous question is ordered?

Mr. STEPHENS. By general consent there may be.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I do not think debate should be cut off.

Mr. PRICE. If the previous question is now ordered, can amendments be offered after that?

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is ordered, its operation will take the bill out of the morning hour; that is, the expiration of the morning hour would have no effect on this bill, and it would proceed to a conclusion. As regards debate, after the previous question is ordered by the House there would be allowed, under the agreement, five minutes to close debate to the gentleman from Georgia who reported the bill, because the bill by agreement is now being discussed under the five-minute rule.

Mr. STEPHENS. I ask that the previous question be sustained, and then that, by general consent, debate may proceed under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If that general consent is given, I have no objection to the previous question being seconded.

Mr. McMILLIN. Does not the ordering of the previous question cut off amendments?

The SPEAKER. If the demand for the previous question is sustained it cuts off amendments.

Mr. EWING. But it is part of the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia that any amendments hereafter offered may be voted on notwithstanding.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. FRYE. What on earth is the object of the previous question if debate and amendments are to be allowed hereafter to an unlimited extent?

Mr. STEPHENS. The object is to get it out of the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question should be seconded, the bill would go right along to-day.

Mr. STEPHENS. I am willing that it should do so.

Mr. FRYE. I think, so far as I am concerned, I should prefer that the bill should remain in the morning hour. It is a pretty safe and healthy bill to be in the morning hour, and I would rather have it there than some unsafe and unhealthy ones.

Mr. MILLS. Under the rules I have the right to make the motion that the House fix a day for the consideration of this bill, and from day to day thereafter till disposed of. I move to fix its consideration for next Saturday.

Mr. WARNER. I raise the point whether the gentleman has the right to make that motion under the rule.

Mr. MILLS. I know that I have, for I drew the rule myself.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is there not an understanding which already governs us that this bill is being considered as in Committee of the Whole, with a right to debate it in five-minute speeches? If so, I object to any further understanding till we get through this bill section by section.

Mr. MILLS. I withdraw my proposition.

Mr. STEPHENS. I move the previous question on the first section of the bill and the amendments pending thereto.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is first on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to the first section which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 5 strike out the word "ten" and insert "fifty;" so that if amended the section will read:

That the holder of any of the silver coins of the United States of smaller denominations than $1, may, on presentation of the same in sums of $50, or any multiple thereof, at the office of the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, receive therefor United States legal-tender money.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 68, noes 101.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. WARNER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 57, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the next amendment to the first section, offered by Mr. GARFIELD, as follows:

In line 7 strike out the words "United States legal-tender money" and insert "lawful money of the United States."

Mr. STEPHENS. I see no difference between United States legal-tender money and lawful money of the United States. The amendment does not change the substance of the provision, and therefore I oppose it.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read section 2, as follows:

SEC. 2. The Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States who may receive any coins under the provision of this act shall exchange the same in sums of $10, or any multiple thereof, for United States legal-tender money, on demand of any holder thereof.

Mr. GARFIELD. I propose the same verbal amendment to that section; to strike out the words "United States legal-tender money" and to insert "lawful money of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read section 3 of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 3. That the present fractional or subsidiary silver coin shall hereafter be a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $10 in full payment, and shall be taken up and legal-tender money given in exchange for them when presented to the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States in sums of $10, or any multiple thereof.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that the same correction be made in that section by substituting "lawful money of the United States" for "legal-tender money."

Mr. STEPHENS. I have no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS. I demand the previous question on the section and amendments thereto.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The Clerk read the first amendment pending to the third section, offered by Mr. SPRINGER, as follows:

Amend the third section of the bill by striking out the word "ten" in the third line and inserting in lieu thereof the word "twenty."

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 100, noes 82.

Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. FORT called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. EWING were appointed.

Mr. HAYES. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has not; but if it had, the previous question is pending on this section and the amendments offered thereto, and that would carry it beyond the morning hour.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 103, noes 86.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, forty members voting therefor.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 123, nays 103, not voting 60; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. STEELE. I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. NORCROSS.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. My colleague, Mr. WELLS, is paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. KILLINGER, and my other colleague, Mr. LAY, is paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. DICK.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to say that my colleague, Mr. WILSON, is absent on account of sickness, and is paired upon all questions.

Mr. WAIT. Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, is paired with Mr. RICHARDSON, of New York, both being absent on business.

Mr. MURCH. My colleague, Mr. LADD, is absent by leave of the House. If present, he would vote "ay."

Mr. HISCOCK. My colleague, Mr. CAMP, is paired with Mr. SMITH, of New Jersey. Mr. CAMP, if here, would vote "no" and Mr. SMITH "ay."

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. My colleague, Mr. RUSSELL, is paired with Mr. MORSE, and my other colleague, Mr. CRAPO, is paired with Mr. ROSS, of New Jersey.

Mr. STONE. My colleague, Mr. HORR, is paired with Mr. BOUCK.

Mr. BAILEY. I am paired with Mr. LOUNSBERY. If he were present, I should vote "no."

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. My colleague, Mr. BALLOU, is paired with the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. MCMAHON. If here, Mr. BALLOU would vote "no."

Mr. COVERT. My colleague, Mr. FERNANDO WOOD, is confined to his house by serious illness.

Mr. ROBESON. I am paired upon all political questions with the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. HURD, but my pair does not include this question, on which we are agreed, and therefore I vote "no."

Mr. URNER. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. MCLANE.

Mr. HAZELTON. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. COX. If he were present, I should vote "no."

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. BLOUNT is absent by leave of the House, and is paired.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to reconsider the vote just taken; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. STEPHENS. I move to reconsider, but I do not move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. I wish time to examine this amendment, in order to see how far it is in symmetry with the other portions of the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. Very well. I will not object to that course. Let the motion to reconsider be entered merely and disposed of hereafter.

Mr. STEPHENS. I also enter the motion to reconsider the votes by which the amendments offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] were adopted, changing the words "legal-tender money" to "lawful money of the United States." I want time to consider those amendments, and I therefore enter the motion to reconsider that I may have until Monday to examine those amendments.

The SPEAKER. But the previous question is prevailing on the section.

Mr. STEPHENS. I will yield now to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.]

Mr. ATKINS. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has; but the previous question is operating upon this section and the amendments thereto. There are two amendments yet to be voted upon.

The next amendment (proposed by Mr. WEAVER) was, to strike out of section 3 all after the word "payment," as follows:

And shall be taken up and legal-tender money given in exchange for them when presented to the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, in sums of $10 or any multiple thereof.

The question was taken upon the amendment; and it was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER. By an amendment to this third section the legal-tender quality of fractional currency coins has been changed from $10 to $20. That presents an incongruity in the bill in this respect: by the first section of the bill these subsidiary silver coins are made changeable for lawful money in sums of $10 or any multiple thereof. By the third section they are made legal tender for $20. The first section of the bill should be amended by striking out "$10" and inserting "$20." I ask unanimous consent that that be done.

Mr. WHITE. I object.

The next amendment (moved by Mr. WARNER) was in section 3 of the bill, after the words "full payment," to insert the words "of all dues public and private."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon the section as amended.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is another amendment to be voted upon, offered by myself.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read.

The amendment was to insert after the words "silver coins" the words "and trade-dollars;" so that the section would read as follows:

That the present fractional or subsidiary silver coins and trade-dollars shall hereafter be a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $20 in full payment of all debts, public and private.

Mr. REED. If that is now offered as an amendment, I want to make a point of order upon it.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the point of order?

Mr. CLAFLIN. It is not germane to the bill.

Mr. REED. It is not germane to the bill. The bill relates to subsidiary coins.

Mr. SPRINGER. The amendment has been pending for half an hour, and it seems to me that the point of order comes too late.

Mr. REED. The trade-dollar is not a coin of the United States.

Mr. SPRINGER. The trade-dollar is not?

Mr. REED. No, sir. It was coined simply as a measure of weight, to be used in foreign countries. I have heard it spoken of here two or three times as if it was on a basis with other coins of the United States.

Mr. SPRINGER. If our Government has time and mints to coin money for other countries, I would like it to devote a little attention to this country.

Mr. REED. That is a sneer, not an answer.

Mr. CLAFLIN. It is nothing but bullion; it is not legal tender.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then we should pass a law to make it a legal tender. If the Government of the United States is to coin a piece of money and then refuse to recognize it——

Mr. REED. It was coined at the express request of those who wanted the United States to refuse to recognize it as money.

Mr. HASKELL. On this question of a point of order I want to say——

Mr. SPRINGER. The point of order is too late. The amendment has been pending now about half an hour.

Mr. HASKELL. You might as well make any kind of bullion considered as coin, and make it redeemable, as to make these trade-dollars coin. If we are to pick up every stray piece of bullion in the United States and make it redeemable as coin, then we might as well take the silver ornaments upon the squaws on our western borders and direct that they shall pass as coin, and make them redeemable, as to pick up these disks of silver which never were coins of the United States, which were made for circulation in foreign countries, which never were legal tender, and have no more to do with the coinage of the United States than if they had never existed.

Mr. BRIGHT. Permit me to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HASKELL. Very well.

Mr. BRIGHT. I wish to make this statement, that though the trade-dollar is not a legal tender, it is confessedly a coin of the United States.

Mr. REED. Yes; the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] confesses it.

Mr. BRIGHT. It is beyond contradiction a coin of the United States, and no person can undertake to make it without the peril of prosecution for counterfeiting the coin of the United States.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Is it claimed that these trade-dollars——

Mr. BRIGHT. If the trade-dollar has been demonetized as to its legal-tender quality——

Mr. REED. It never had any legal-tender quality, and so cannot be demonetized.

Mr. BRIGHT. It certainly is a silver coin of the United States and germane to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to have Rule 48 read.

The Clerk read as follows:

No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment. No bill or resolution shall, at any time, be amended by annexing thereto, or incorporating therewith, any other bill or resolution pending before the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is the point of order entertained by the Chair as coming within the time when it should be made?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the understanding was that by considering this bill by sections an opportunity would be presented to make points of order against amendments as the sections to which they relate were reached.

Mr. SPRINGER. If that be so, I desire to speak to the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. SPRINGER. I submit that this proposition is germane to the pending section. This section provides "that the present fractional or subsidiary silver coin shall hereafter be a legal tender in sums not exceeding $20 in full payment," &c.

Now, the title of this bill is "A bill to provide for the interchange of subsidiary coins for legal-tender money under certain circumstances, and to make such coins a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $10." This title has reference to coinage of less value than the silver dollar of 412½ grains. The trade-dollar is a dollar containing more than 412½ grains of silver, but under existing laws it has not the legal-tender quality which the dollar of 412½ grains has. Now, while this trade-dollar is not a subsidiary coin in the ordinary meaning of the term, it has in point of fact taken its place in the circulation of the country as a coin of less value than the standard silver dollar. It is a part of the coinage of the Government, at least, and, as such, its legal-tender quality is a kindred subject to that of other silver coins of the United States.

Mr. WARNER. Allow me to suggest to the gentleman that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures have now under consideration bills which cover all this ground; and it was not anticipated that there would be an attempt on this bill to bring in all these questions relating to the silver currency.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am very glad that the committee intend to bring in a bill on this subject.

Mr. STEPHENS nodded assent.

Mr. SPRINGER. Upon the assurance of the chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures that a bill for this purpose will be reported at an early day, I ask leave to withdraw my amendment. I understand that the bill to be reported by the Committee will make the trade-dollar a full legal tender.

Mr. WARNER. It will cover that ground.

Mr. SPRINGER. A legal tender for amounts of $20 or less or a full legal tender?

Mr. STEPHENS. For any amount.

Mr. SPRINGER. I prefer that these trade-dollars should be made a legal tender for all debts, public and private, just like the dollar of 412½ grains; but, of course, I would rather take half a loaf than have no bread at all.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois withdraw his amendment?

Mr. SPRINGER. I do.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moved a reconsideration of the vote on one of the amendments. That question should properly be taken now.

Mr. STEPHENS. I withdraw that motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the gentleman from Ohio submitted a motion to strike out the entire section. He is not advised whether the gentleman insists on that motion or not. If he does, the question should now be taken.

Mr. CLAFLIN. The entire section has been changed since, and there is now no objection to it.

Several MEMBERS. Yes, there is.

The SPEAKER. The section, as amended, will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the present fractional or subsidiary silver coin shall hereafter be a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $20, in full payment of all debts, public and private.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Ohio to strike out the section was made before it was amended. If that motion is not considered as withdrawn it should now be voted on.

Mr. MONROE. I make the motion to strike out section 3 as amended.

The motion was not agreed to; there being ayes 14, noes not counted.

Mr. LEWIS. I move to strike out the first and second sections of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Those sections have been agreed to.

Mr. LEWIS. Amendments were offered to those sections of the bill, but there has never been an opportunity to offer a motion to strike out both sections together.

The SPEAKER. The House has passed from the consideration of those sections.

Mr. LEWIS. But they were considered one at a time.

The SPEAKER. But it would have been in order to strike out each section at the time it was under consideration. The House has now passed from the consideration of those sections.

The question being taken on agreeing to the third section as amended, it was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the section was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MONROE. Has not the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. MILLS. But was not the previous question operating?

The SPEAKER. Only on that section.

Mr. MILLS. But the previous question operates on my amendment.

The SPEAKER. No; the previous question has not been called on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] called the previous question on the pending section and amendment, including, as I understood, the substitute of my colleague. It operated, I believe, upon all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the amendment of the gentleman from Texas was not an amendment to the third section.

Mr. MILLS. No, sir; it was a substitute for the whole bill.

The SPEAKER. The time has not come when a substitute for the whole bill can be considered.

Mr. STEPHENS. Let my motion to reconsider the vote agreeing to the third section be not acted on now, but lie over until the next morning hour.

Mr. REED. Has not the motion to reconsider been laid on the table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the motion to reconsider the vote by which the third section was agreed to was made, and was supplemented by a motion to lay on the table, upon which the vote was taken.

Mr. STEPHENS. Very well; let the motion go.

Mr. REED. I do not make any objection; I only want the record right.

Mr. KENNA. Does the previous question, as demanded and ordered, reach the fourth section?

The SPEAKER. It does not, because it was not ordered on anything but the third section and the pending amendments. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] now raises the point that the morning hour has expired.

Mr. MILLS. I desire my amendment shall be printed in the RECORD so gentlemen can examine it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that all amendments proposed to be offered to this bill be handed up now so they may go into the RECORD to be printed. The amendment of the gentleman from Texas having been read is already in the RECORD.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to give notice that I shall reserve all points of order upon these amendments.

The SPEAKER. That of course will be the understanding.

Mr. LEWIS. Was there any motion made to reconsider the vote by which either the first or second sections of the bill were passed?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks such motion was made and laid upon the table.

Mr. LEWIS. I have no recollection of it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised by the journal clerk that a motion to reconsider and lay upon the table was not made in the case either of the first or second sections as amended.

Mr. LEWIS. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which those sections were adopted.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, but the motion to reconsider will be entered.

Mr. LEWIS. My motion to reconsider, then, is pending.

The SPEAKER. It is. Gentlemen will now present all amendments they propose to offer to the bill so they may be printed in the RECORD for information.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I shall move to add to section 4 the following:

The Clerk read as follows:

That the silver coin known as the trade-dollar, heretofore coined by the mints of the United States, shall be a legal tender to the full extent that a silver dollar of 412½ grains now being coined is.

Mr. BUCKNER. I make the point of order on that now.

The SPEAKER. All points of order are reserved by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GILLETTE. I move as an additional section between the third and fourth sections to insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, when desired by the holders of minor coins or of legal-tender money, redeem such coin or legal-tender money when presented at the office of the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States in sums of $10, or any multiple thereof, in fractional paper currency of ten-cent, twenty-five-cent, and fifty-cent denominations, which shall be a legal-tender for $10 and re-exchangeable for lawful money of the United States in sums of $10, or any multiple thereof.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I move to add to the first section the following:

That all coins of every description of the United States of the face value of twenty-five cents and under shall be received at all post-offices for the payment of postage or the purchase of postage-stamps in any sum not exceeding $3.

Mr. STEPHENS. This is an additional section.

The SPEAKER. All these points will be decided when these amendments come up for action. They are merely presented now for information and to give the notice required.

Mr. FORT. I now present the following as an additional section:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be exchanged at the Treasury and at all subtreasuries of the United States legal-tender silver dollars of 420 grains standard silver for trade-dollars at par; and shall recoin the said trade-dollars into legal-tender dollars of 412½ grains of standard silver, as now provided by law; and shall stop the further coinage or trade-dollars.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. I move as an amendment, after the word "debts" in the third line of section 3, to add the words "dues and demands."

Mr. EWING. As the House does not understand very clearly what has already been done, I hope consent will be given that amendments may be presented on Monday next, and handed to the Clerk, to be printed and pending.

Mr. WARNER. I object.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to proceed with the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committe of the Whole, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PRICE. I yield for two minutes to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.]

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Chairman, there seemed to be some misunderstanding yesterday between the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] and the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MCKINLEY.] I desire to give here the construction which is put upon the speech of the gentleman from Kentucky in the State of Mississippi by the now famous paper, which I receive through the mail, called the States. Let me read: "Okolona, Mississippi, April 16, 1879." It is complimentary to the chairman, and therefore he will take no offense:

What was it that brave JO BLACKBURN said in the House, Messrs. Softshells?
Oh, yes! We remember now; he remarked that our party would strike the last vestige of the war measures from the statute-books.
The States never said more and never said less than that.
You repudiate the States.
Will you repudiate BLACKBURN?
You are silent.
Will you repudiate BLACKBURN?

You are still silent.

Well, gentlemen, we will give you just one more chance. Answer, or forever after hold your peace as far as the States is concerned: Will you repudiate BLACKBURN?

Down with the devil-born amendments!

Down with centralism and its hints of crown and scepter!

Down with the pictures of Lincoln and the scoundrels who surrounded him in the battle-days of '61-'65.

Down with every anti-democratic idea and idol!

These be the watchwords for '80.

[Great laughter and applause on the republican side.]

The copy of the paper which I received this morning actually bristles all over with indorsements of papers all over the South and indorsements from political friends. [Laughter and applause on the republican side of the House.]

Mr. CLYMER took the place of Mr. BLACKBURN as chairman of the committee.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Chairman, if this be not the first time I have been forced to complain of unfairness at the hands of my friends on the other side it is surely the first time I was ever compelled to make such a complaint against the gentleman from Maine. I have but this to say: I regret that each recurring day brings up some personal assault which it seems to me that fair-dealing, honesty of construction, and ordinary manhood would repudiate; but, sir, with each recurring day I find myself forced to repel a misconstruction given either by some member of this House to language uttered in the shape of garbled quotation or else an unwarranted, unfair, unnatural construction put upon somebody else's language by a member on that side.

So far as the newspaper article that the gentleman from Maine has read to this House is concerned, I care nothing for it. The editor of that paper, a contribution from Ohio to Mississippi, it would seem repeats the unfair, ungenerous, and untruthful effort that was made here on yesterday to misrepresent me. I care nothing for the utterance of that paper. But when the gentleman from Maine seeks to add his high authority to the injustice done by the editor of that inconsequential sheet, it then becomes a more serious and noticeable matter; then I group the paper and the gentleman from Maine together, and say to this committee and to the country that it occurs to me they are well-mated; the one is about as much unfair as the other is illiberal and crazy. [Applause.]

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Chairman, the one was a colonel in the confederate service and not a carpet-bagger from Ohio. The one was the peer of the gentleman from Kentucky in the service of the South. Of the other I have nothing to say.

Mr. BLACKBURN. But I have. I have this to say of the other: he seems to be more perfectly familiar with the history, the antecedents, and the merits of this adventurer than I care to be. But whether he served in that army or the other is a matter of no concern to me. I simply desire to repeat that in the article which the gentleman has read, complimentary as he chooses to term it, in order to twist it to a partisan purpose, he perpetrated an act of gross injustice to which the gentleman from Maine, to my utter amazement, has sought to lend his high authority.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Chairman, I did this and nothing more: I heard the speech of the gentleman from Kentucky when it was made upon this floor, before it appeared in the RECORD, as it was taken by the Associated Press and sent all over this country. I say that in the South I had not one scintilla of doubt the construction would be put upon the gentleman's language which the States has put upon it; and if the gentleman here upon the floor of the House made a declaration which the Associated Press at the time could declare to be what it did, and which the States subsequently, from the dispatches of the Associated Press, can declare jubilantly to be what its heart desires it to be, I say it is not I who should be called to an account for having it repeated in this House. I say that it is my right and not illiberal, and not unjust to the gentleman from Kentucky, to cite here to the House no words of mine, only the words of this paper published in the State of Mississippi; only the words of this editor, as I said, indorsed by score upon score of papers in the South. I know, sir, that I intended no injustice to the gentleman from Kentucky. I do not think that the personal relations existing between us would lead him for a moment to suppose that I would make an attack upon him which would injure him. I say, sir, on my conscience, and from the utterances I have seen in the papers of the South—I say I am entitled to believe that the gentleman from Kentucky, if he had uttered on this floor the very words written in this paper, no more, no less, would have commended himself to nine out of every ten of the democrats south of Mason and Dixon's line to-day.

Mr. DAVIDSON. You do injustice to our people in saying so.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I wish the gentleman from Maine distinctly to understand me. I stand by the record made in this House. I say his colleague and himself acted as fairly——

Mr. MCKINLEY. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. BLACKBURN. Not now.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Only for a question.

Mr. BLACKBURN. He will have a chance if he wants it afterward. I stand by the record made in this House; and I go further. The words that I uttered here were stronger on the very line that I made my remarks upon on yesterday and to-day than they stand as they should be quoted from the RECORD itself. I say more. There was no dispatch sent by the Associated Press that warranted the garbling of my utterances to which I have been subjected both by the gentleman's colleague and by that emissary whom he sent among my people. I do not know what inducement was offered to this gentleman to make his home among a people that he persistently seeks to misrepresent. I am not prepared to say, possibly the gentleman from Maine can tell, whether forced contributions levied upon departmental clerks and Government employés constituted the motive that led him to the work that seems to answer so good a purpose. [Applause on the democratic side.] Of this I do not know. I do not take issue with the gentleman from Maine when he says that this man is my peer, or was once. That may or may not be.

Mr. FRYE. In the Army.

Mr. BLACKBURN. But I only mean to say this: that in the matter of injustice done, misrepresentation made, he has not shown himself superior to the gentleman from Maine to-day.

Mr. MCKINLEY and Mr. FRYE rose.

Mr. BARBER. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to ask him a single question?

Mr. BLACKBURN. As many as the gentleman desires.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BARBER] insist on his point of order?

Mr. BARBER. I do not.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I desire to ask the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, who in such very violent language as I see by the RECORD this morning, charged me with having garbled his remarks—I desire to ask him if his speech, and especially that sentence, a part of which I quoted in my speech of yesterday, appears in the RECORD of April 4 as it was delivered before the committee in the House of Representatives?

Mr. BLACKBURN. It does, with no substantial alteration made.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Ah!

Mr. BLACKBURN. But weakened instead of strengthened from the language that was held.

Mr. MCKINLEY. One other question, if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Just a single question. I want to have a distinct understanding about this matter and I seek nothing more in this controversy; I therefore ask the gentleman if this is not the language which he used before this committee, and which was taken down by the reporters and sent all over this country by the Associated Press:

We do not intend to stop until we have stricken the last vestige of your war measures from the statute-book, which like these, looked to the abridgment of the liberties of the citizen.

And I will ask the gentleman if he did not, subsequent to his delivery of the speech before the committee, go into the reporter's room and add the following words after the word "these:" "were born of the passions incident to civil strife and?"

Mr. BLACKBURN. Precisely; I will read the speech now as it was spoken on the floor and as it was published in the RECORD:

We do not intend to stop until we have stricken the last vestige of your war measures from the statute-book, which like these looked to the abridgment of the liberties of the citizen.

That is what was said on the floor.

Mr. MCKINLEY. And you added to that?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I hope the gentleman will be patient, as I am speaking in my own time now, and allow me to answer his question.

Mr. MCKINLEY. All right; I do not desire to take advantage of the gentleman.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Now, what I inserted were these words:

Were born of the passions incident to civil strife.

If that is a substantial alteration of the RECORD, if that is a transgression of the liberty which every member upon this floor takes with the notes sent to his rooms for supervision and correction, if it should be held by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] to whom I was replying, that I have been guilty of any violation of the practice of this House or any material alteration or change in the language used on this floor, I am willing to abide by his judgment. I say upon the contrary that I weakened instead of strengthened the expression I used.

Mr. MCKINLEY. The question to the gentleman which I desired to put, and which I think he has frankly answered, was whether he changed his speech. He did change the speech and put in the RECORD language different from that which he used in the committee here.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I deny that. I did not change it, nor change one word.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Did I understand the gentleman to say that he did not insert the words—

Were born of the passions incident to civil strife?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I did; but I changed nothing.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky another question. He said that yesterday when I was somewhat heated in debate he sent me a pamphlet copy of his speech delivered upon the Army appropriation bill on April 4. As I stated yesterday I did not observe the paper. My attention was not called to it immediately. After I sat down a gentleman called my attention to it, and, as the RECORD shows, I rose for the purpose of complying with my promise to the gentleman from Kentucky and read that portion of the speech to which he called my attention. Now, referring to the pamphlet copy of the speech, I desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if in that pamphlet copy the sentence we are now discussing is not different from the copy of the speech in the RECORD?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the gentleman refer to the word "alone?"

Mr. MCKINLEY. That is the word I refer to.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will answer the gentleman, and say that that portion of my speech I never did revise. I never revised that portion of the notes furnished by the stenographer of the House to me; they were not revised by myself at all.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Allow me to ask another question.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman need not be impatient; he will get all the answers he wants.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And then he will hear some questions in addition.

That portion of the notes of my speech were not revised by myself, but by one who was requested to correct any grammatical errors and matters of punctuation. I never saw it; I never touched it. The word "alone," I think, was used upon this floor. I find it in that pamphlet copy, and I do not see it in the RECORD. I cannot undertake to say, nor do I care. If the gentleman wants to make that point, he is welcome to it.

Now let me catechise the gentleman a little. He made a speech yesterday which I am satisfied his sense of fairness will induce him to wish he had never uttered. I ask the gentleman whether the notes of that speech were submitted to him for revision and whether he revised them?

Mr. MCKINLEY. They were.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I would like to ask him one more question. As he seems not to have been content with the result of yesterday, and comes now to make some further correction of his egregious blunder, will he tell me now, if he be fair-minded, why it was that on yesterday, when the charge was hurled into his face of a deliberate act of injustice done, in spite of appeal made openly from the chair, in spite of a written note which I saw put in his hand by a page and carelessly flung away by him—after he had done that and he was called upon by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] to make at least some amend for this unquestionable conduct by allowing the colloquy to go into his speech—why did he refuse even that poor remedy?

Mr. MCKINLEY. Is that your question?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCKINLEY. In answer to that I desire to say what I said on yesterday. I announced here to the House that my speech, with the gentleman's remarks and explanations in relation to what he termed the garbling of a portion of his speech—I declared before this committee at that time that the two speeches should go into the RECORD together, side by side; and they appear so in the RECORD this morning. If the gentleman has any desire to have his remarks in relation to this particular sentence accompany my speech, or to have my speech accompany his remarks, I give him the privilege now to publish my speech with his explanation, and to circulate them wherever he pleases throughout this country.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I thank the gentleman for his kindness; but in candor I assure him that I do not feel that I would be benefited by the association. [Applause and laughter on the democratic side.]

Mr. MCKINLEY. I am sure I would not, and I am sure this country would not be benefited by any such association.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Now I have but a word to say. I trust that I am done with these miserable wrangles. And to anybody and everybody against whom I have held either real or imaginary cause of grievance, I say to them all now, once and for all, neither in this place nor elsewhere did I ever complain of a manly blow stricken from the front; but it is only the unmanly stab that is delivered in the back. Quote men fairly. Why will you undertake to quote one-half of a sentence out of a gentleman's speech and read it in print, when you do not stop at a period (.), you do not wait to reach a semicolon (;), you stop at a comma (,) and then persistently refuse to read the other two lines that would complete the sentence.

Mr. MCCOID. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] a question.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have no objection.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order! Regular order!

Mr. MCCOID. I want to ask the gentleman if he did not end the sentence in this way——

Renewed cries of "Regular order!"

Mr. STEVENSON. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. CLYMER.) The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEVENSON. My point of order is that this discussion is entirely out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken, and the committee will come to order. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MCCOID. I wish to ask this one question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] will proceed.

Mr. MCCOID. I was recognized——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman now seeking the floor is not in order, as the Chair has said several times. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] is entitled to the floor and will proceed as soon as order is restored in the committee. [After a pause.] The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, in the few moments that I have upon this subject I do not propose to make any comments upon the Constitution of the United States. I do not propose to make any comments upon any of the lengthy or learned decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in connection with the discussion of this question; nor do I propose to review English history back to the time of the Edwards. That has been done by gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber sufficiently for the occasion, I think. Nor do I intend to base what arguments I may present to the committee upon anything that has been done or omitted to be done by the House of Commons of the English Parliament. That ground has been thoroughly gone over and discussed more ably than I would be able to do, even if I undertook it. In addition to that, I think that more than one hundred years have elapsed since we dissolved the business and political partnership that existed between this country and Great Britain and set up to do business for ourselves, and that we were entirely competent to manage our own political affairs.

As I understand it, the subject before this committee is the consideration of two appropriation bills that failed to pass the Forty-fifth Congress. I am of the opinion that the country looks on with perfect astonishment and surprise that nearly four hundred men, selected from the body of the people presumably for their intelligence and integrity, should have allowed the Forty-fifth Congress to die without making any provision that the Government should live.

The whole question that has caused this failure to pass these appropriation bills in the Forty-fifth Congress, and that has called together at this expense of time and money the Representatives of the people from different parts of the Union in this extra session, is simply a question whether we will vote the supplies to keep the machinery of the Government in operation. When it comes to be divested of all the trimming and tinsel foreign to the real question at issue it amounts to this: that the republican party (and I read from the bill, that there may be no mistake) say that—

> Every officer of the Army or Navy, or other person in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, who orders, brings, keeps, or has under his authority or control any troops or armed men at any place where a general or special election is held in any State, unless such force be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States, or to keep the peace at the polls, shall be fined not more than $5,000, and suffer imprisonment at hard labor not less than three months nor more than five years.

Divested of all surplusage, the republican party say that none of these things shall happen under a penalty of fine and imprisonment unless it be necessary. But I ask gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, in all good faith and honesty, are they prepared to say that if it is necessary this shall not be done? In all this discussion—and I want to bring this before the committee and before the country—no one man upon the other side of the Chamber has had the courage to say that in case there is a necessity for it, it should not be done. But in general terms gentlemen on the other side propose to strike from the law these eight monosyllables, "or to keep the peace at the polls;" the effect of which would be that no power, civil or otherwise, shall be used, even if necessary. This is the differenec between the democratic and republican parties on this bill. Republicans say the peace shall be kept at the polls and good citizens protected in their rights, and that force shall be used if necessary. The democrats say it shall not.

The principal object I have in taking the floor at this time is to make this matter plain to the people of the country, because it is very evident that the whole object of this discussion and the failure to pass this bill in the Forty-fifth Congress and the efforts to defeat its passage in this Congress is to make political capital for elections in the future. Nobody will dispute that; it is patent to everybody.

The battle-cry, the slogan of the democratic party is "free elections;" and the attempt is made to create the impression that as a consequence, if they are in favor of free elections, then we, the republican party, are opposed to free elections. Well, the only difference, Mr. Chairman, is this: we are in favor of free elections for honest men, law-abiding citizens, order-loving people of the land who are entitled to the use of the ballot; and on the other side they are in favor of free elections for men who do not obey the laws, for men who are disloyal to the country, for men whose business it is to see that the ballot-box is not kept pure but is corrupted, that there shall neither be a fair vote nor a fair count. I make this charge, fearless of successful contradiction. The history of the country in the past and the practices in the present justify me in the declaration. To-day while we are discussing this question upon this floor, there are men in the Atlantic cities of this Republic who are hidden away in the dark alleys, in the dens, and in the cellars, who when night draws her sable curtain over the earth will swarm out from their hiding places to prey upon honest, law-abiding citizens. Every one of these men wishes the democratic party success in the repeal of this part of the election laws. Every ballot-box stuffer, every repeater, every rough, every short-boy, every white-liner, every "dead rabbit"—every man of this disreputable class by whatever names you characterize them, wishes you success in this enterprise and is aiding and abetting you in furtherance of your project. Now remember I do not say that all the men who are in favor of this project are of that class; I am glad to say that such is not the case; but I reiterate that all this class of men I have enumerated are in favor of the repeal of this part of the election laws. And the democratic party in this House say that these laws shall be repealed even if by so doing, roughs, rowdies, repeaters, bullies, and ballot-box stuffers take possesssion of the polls and drive peaceable and good citizens from them. And they also say that in order to compel compliance with their demands, they will withhold the needed supplies for carying on the Government; that the Army shall be disbanded; the courts shall hold no sessions, and that lawlessness may run riot throughout the land unchecked. The republican party have opposed this doctrine to the extent of their power and will continue to do so and appeal to the soverign people to decide who is right.

Suppose we take a sample of an election held under this law. The law-abiding citizens, the men entitled to vote, are depositing their ballots peaceably and quietly as good people do. A band of roughs armed not with the ballot but with the bludgeon and the bowie-knife, surround the polls and take possession of them; and unless you have an armed force to meet an armed force you cannot disperse these law-breakers. I am not drawing on my imagination for this case; for while we have been discussing this question in this House within the last two weeks an election was in progress at Flatbush, Long Island, at which, according to the telegraphic dispatches in our papers, the class of men I have described did take possession of the polls, did drive away the peaceable, law-abiding citizens so that it became necessary to send over to the city of New York to get an armed force to disperse these "roughs" and armed bullies so that peaceable men might be allowed to exercise the elective franchise. Now, there is not a respectable democrat in this House or elsewhere who would not say that in a case of that kind an armed force ought not to be called in to restore peace at the polls. Yet you propose to strike from your laws the authority under which this may be done; for these two bills are substantially the same; their object being simply the preservation of the purity of the ballot-box and the fair holding of elections among the people—which are the foundation-stones of our civil fabric.

In passing I wish to ask gentlemen on the other side of the House if it was the honest intention to test upon this question the will of the people, the source of all power, why not do as you did in reference to that portion of this bill which provided for the prevention of the cattle disease? Why not take from the bill these provisions and refer them to a proper committee so that they may come up on their merits? You say that the people are with you. If they are, you risk nothing. If you will do that, we can pass these appropriation bills in thirty minutes, so that the country may promptly have peace and rest. You do not believe what you say—I know that is a pretty bald declaration, but I believe it honestly—you do not believe what you say when you declare that the people are with you on this question. If you so believe, you risk nothing by passing these provisions as separate measures. You can put them through this House without our consent; and we will promise not to filibuster; we will meet you fairly; we will vote as our consciences dictate. And if you pass them through this House you can pass them through the other branch of Congress; you can send them to the President. If he signs the bill you have your law, and if he vetoes them you can go to the country upon that issue; and if the people are with you, you have achieved a victory that is lasting in its results.

Do you not see it? But you dare not do it. You have been challenged again and again to make squarely this issue before the people, and you have refused simply because you have not dared to trust yourselves before the people upon this question. You place these repealing clauses upon the general legislative appropriation bill, and in effect you say to the President of the United States, sign this or we will starve your Army and your judiciary. I do not propose to say anything about what the President will do, because I do not know anything about it; but I will say this, that I believe all the talk about the power of the President to do or not to do, about his duty to do or not to do, is time lost and labor thrown away.

The Constitution of the United States without any note or comment to it is so plain no man need err in reference to it. When a bill is presented to him the Constitution says, "If he has no objection to it he shall sign it." That is plain. Those are as strong English words as we have. "If he has objections he shall return it to the House where it originated with his objections." That is the end of it. We, therefore, need not speculate about what the President is going to do, for it is a plain and straightforward matter so far as he is concerned, and I presume he will act accordingly.

But you place him in that position and you are going to the country upon that issue. You say to him, "Sign this bill or we will starve your Army." The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] on my left—and I think a good deal of him, for he was one of the few men with whom I had the pleasure of voting to stop legislation on Sunday—that gentleman surprised me by saying, and I will not pretend to give his exact language, but if I make any mistake in reference to it he is listening to me and can make the proper corrections—I was surprised, I say, to hear him state to the House that if the President vetoed these bills the Army would die on the 30th day of June next. He also stated that if he had this to do again, referring to his past history in reference to the recent troubles which agitated the country, he would, under the same circumstances, do the same thing over again. He now tells us that unless the President signs these bills the Army will die on the 30th day of June next. I wish the country to understand if the democratic party can have its way then the Army dies on the 30th day of June next. And if the Army dies on the 30th of June, then there will be no protection to the Indian frontier; then there will be no protection to the Mexican border, and peaceable citizens will have to lose their lives and property because the democratic party in the House of Representatives, and in the Senate too, I presume, although I know nothing and care nothing about that, because the democratic party refuses to pass an appropriation bill unless it has a rider upon it which they think the President will veto. This shows the animus of the party, and I arraign it at the bar of public opinion on these charges, and to them they will have to plead and make answer.

I was a little surprised, nay, Mr. Chairman, I was a good deal surprised to hear my amiable friend from Mississippi whom I do not see in his seat—I wish I did—say in reference to this republican party that reckoning some of the evils and the ills that occurred, sir, during the years of the past and the great many bad things the republican party had done, I was astonished to hear him say in his speech that this republican party was "dead and damned." [Laughter.] It was bad enough to be dead, but I think he will find that it is about the liveliest corpse of which history gives any account. [Laughter.] But to be damned! that is horrible in the extreme. If I understand the meaning of the word, theologically it means this: It is only applied to sinners, and if to sinners and applies to us, per consequence, the democratic party being in opposition to us, opposed to us as much as the poles are, diametrically opposed to us, then the democratic party must be the party of saints. Now, I ask you to look at it. If I may be allowed the expression, and it will not be unparliamentary, I would say to casual observers it looks like a pretty rough-looking lot of saints. [Laughter.] They may be fiat saints; that is another kind; I am not prepared to say. But that is the kind of language used toward this side of the House; and we have stood here patiently because we have that charity which suffereth long and is kind; we think no evil; we bear all things and suffer all things; and therefore have taken these things quietly. If I reply to gentlemen on the other side of the House, and quote them literally and make no unfair comment, they cannot complain. They must not think I am their enemy because I do that, because he is your true friend who tells you the truth in reference to yourself.

Then another gentleman from Mississippi, who I think is in his seat, went to the Bible for proof that they were right and that we were wrong. I thought then, and I think now, that it is the worst book in the world for the democrats to go to for precedents. [Laughter.] But I will give the quotation; I have it here before me, and will read it if necessary. I see my friend in his seat. He referred us to the fact that they ought to be let alone. I do not give his exact language, and will not unless you ask it. Perhaps I had better give the exact language, for I do not wish to be charged with garbling it. Here it is. He says:

> But we said to you as the patriarch Abraham said to Lot, "Let there be no strife between thee and me; you go to the North and we will go to the South."

Well, that is good reading. But I have an indistinct, nay, not a very indistinct but rather a distinct idea that that same language was substantially used toward us in the years of the past. They said to us—we had had some strife, you know, between our herdsman and the masters of the other herds and when Missouri was admitted into the Union after a great deal of strife we agreed to admit her with slavery, and then they said: "You go to the North," just as Abraham said; "and we will go to the South;" and if I remember distinctly we made a line running on the line of 36.30; and we said slavery may come up to that line but shall not cross it; and the people to the south of the line agreed to it. We of the North, though we did not believe in slavery, said we would not interfere with it there. Did we divide the land?

Mr. CHALMERS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. PRICE. Yes, sir; for a question.

Mr. CHALMERS. Did you or did you not refuse to extend that line to the Pacific Ocean?

Mr. PRICE. Ay, my friend, at a certain time and under different circumstances. When the circumstances of the case were different we did refuse to extend the line to the Pacific Ocean, but we kept the original contract, and you did not. You, after a while, had filled up, as you supposed, your territory, though we had added to it that vast empire, as the gentleman from Texas very properly termed it in his speech the other day—we had added that vast empire of Texas to the Union as slave territory. Not satisfied with that, you proposed to cross that line of 36.30 under the shadow of squatter sovereignty, and you did cross it, and you did kill the people on the other side, and you did destroy the property. You had shot down old John Brown's son in cold blood on the public highway, and had destroyed the property of those who had property there. And when old John Brown, driven to desperation, rallied sixteen men, armed with iron pikes, and went over to destroy the State of Virginia, the Mother of Presidents, you took him and tried him and hung him. You were not satisfied with that. You hung him because he was a traitor, I suppose; because he was stirring up insurrection among the people; because he was making it unsafe for the lives and property of the people of Virginia. I suppose that was the reason. At all events, you hung him. He is dead, and his body is in the grave.

Mr. ACKLEN. Will the gentleman permit me——

Mr. PRICE. Not now. The gentleman will sit down. You did not stop there. You came over, aided by democrats from the North, and I want my democratic friends of the North to remember this and remember it to some good purpose—you came over on our side, and with the aid of democrats of the North in this House (and I want to say right here parenthetically that the democrats of the North have always been controlled by the democrats of the South; they were so until 1861, and they are so to-day)—well, you came over to our side; after you had got Texas and had made this bargain to stay on your own side of the fence you came to our side, and with the aid of these men you made us the slave-catchers for the South. That was one of the most unholy laws that ever disgraced the statute-book of any nation claiming to be civilized, not to say Christianized.

What was the effect of it? A man in the sugar plantations of Louisiana or the rice-fields of Georgia or the cotton-fields of Mississippi has a wife and three children; it becomes necessary for the pecuniary benefit of his master to sell one of the children; after awhile it becomes necessary to sell another; after awhile it becomes necessary to sell the third; the children are then all gone; after awhile the wife is sold also, and the man is left alone. He is a black man, presumed to have neither soul nor feeling. He has a body, however, or you would not want him. He is satisfied it is necessary for him to do something for himself; and on some night, when the sable curtains are drawn over the earth, he takes the north star for his guide and strikes for freedom, as every man with the instincts of a man would do. He lays by in the day-time and hides in the swamps or the forests, but, steady to his purpose, travels by night. As soon as his flight is discovered the blood-hounds, the four-legged and the two-legged blood-hounds, are after him, and the whole power of the United States Government is brought to bear against him. The Constitution of the United States was found broad enough and long enough and deep enough to cover all that; and you levied the forces not only of the South but of the North and followed that man, if he was fortunate enough to escape from you, till he reached Plymouth rock itself and knelt upon that sacred spot and looked out upon the waves yet luminous with the track of the May Flower; and there kneeling to thank God for deliverance, the mailed hand of the law, backed up by the Constitution of the United States and the entire civil and, if necessary, the entire military power of the United States was laid upon him, and you dragged him back to chains and slavery. That is what you did under that law; that is what you did when you had bargained to stay on your side of the line; and we submitted to it till, thank God, in the dispensation of Providence and the order of events, the republican party took possession of the Government and struck that law from the statute-book, never again to be restored.

The Constitution was not infringed; the Constitution was not at all interfered with when you did that. That was all right when the South was to be benefited, but it is all wrong when you propose to protect decent men at the ballot-box and drive back and punish the rowdies and shoulder-hitters. It would be unconstitutional to do that. But you said that if we elected a northern man President you would let loose the dogs of war upon us, and you did it, not at Harper's Ferry but at Fort Sumter; and there was the first grand mistake that the democratic party made, and you are profiting by the mistake you then made. You will never do it again.

So far as diplomacy is concerned you are more than the equals of the North; so far as maneuvering at the ballot-box is concerned you are more than the equals of the North, for you all stand solidly together; but when you fired the first gun at Fort Sumter it was the one grand mistake of your lives, and when the reverberations of that shot echoed through the land there arose a power in the North of which you knew nothing. It had been slumbering and you awoke it, and awoke it to your cost and to your sorrow.

I was surprised the other day to hear gentlemen talk about starving the Government. You never can leave it in a worse condition, than you did when Buchanan left the presidential chair. You had no money in the Treasury, and no man would trust you. You had had the control of this Government uninterrupted in time of perfect peace excepting during the brief period of the Mexican war, and any man who knows anything about the history of the country knows that you had it all your own way, and yet when you had to surrender the Government you had not a dollar in the Treasury and no credit in any of the money markets of the world. You could not borrow money without paying 8, 9½ or 12 per cent., and you only wanted $20,000,000 and could only get one-half of that at these high rates. Now we borrow millions at 4 per cent. and we can hardly supply the demand made for our bonds. This is the work of the republican party. And yet with this state of facts the democrats have no word of praise but volumes of censure for republican men and measures.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PRICE. No; no. I have no time to yield, and the gentleman will please sit down. I seldom take the floor, and when I have it I cannot give all my time to interruptions. I wish to say in this connection that the South does not want this amendment of the law. What do they want it for? You have no soldiers in the South. There are four or five Southern States, Mississippi notably, where there is not a soldier. Let me see, I have the list of them here. Delaware has no soldiers in it, nor are there any in West Virginia, Tennessee, Kentucky, Missouri, or Mississippi. There is not a soldier in any of these Southern States if this record which I have before me be true, and in the other Southern States, in Alabama, for instance, there are thirty-two United States soldiers, and in some of the other Southern States a very few; for instance, Maryland, one hundred and ninety-two; Virginia, at Fortress Monroe, two hundred and eighty-two; North Carolina, thirty; South Carolina, one hundred and twenty; Georgia, twenty-nine; Florida, one hundred and eighty-two; Arkansas, fifty-seven; Louisiana, two hundred and thirty-nine—most of whom are guarding posts or forts for the protection of harbors. Six Southern States without a single soldier, and only the small number above scattered located all over the other States on guard duty. So the South has no fear of United States troops, and cares nothing for this amendment. The South is peaceable. Order reigns in Warsaw. Every man votes as he pleases, provided always that he votes the democratic ticket.

No, Mr. Chairman, the repeal of this law is not needed for the South so much as it is for New York City and other large cities where the repeaters and ballot-box stuffers most do congregate.

Is Alabama afraid that those thirty-two soldiers would overcome her liberties and deprive her of free representation? You must remember you do not confine it to the Army, but you include the Navy. If some stranger were sitting here and listening to the debates he would think that every soldier in the United States was on a forced march to the ballot-boxes at different points in the United States, and that the entire Navy was under full press of sail, with every pound of steam on which it could possibly carry without shattering the machinery, and bearing up to the places of holding elections wherever water enough could be found to float a vessel. We wanted you to leave in the law the right to use the civil power to preserve the peace at the polls when necessary, and we would let you take away the Army and the Navy; but you refused and continue to refuse even that.

I was proceeding to say that a man who was not acquainted with the history of this country and knew nothing about our political divisions would think that we on this side of the House had been spending the last eighteen years in trying to destroy the country, and that these patriots on the other side of the House had sacrificed everything, home, country, and almost life itself, for the purpose of its preservation. I do not know of any parallel to this in history excepting in the case of the man who had murdered his father and mother and was arrested, tried and convicted for the offense, and when sentence was about to be pronounced upon him he invoked the mercy of the court because he was an orphan. [Great laughter and applause.] I believe the court did not admit the plea. I think they hung the man. [Laughter.]

I do not say that the same rule should be applied to gentlemen on the other side of the House, but I do not know anything that comes nearer a parallel. You spent years in trying to destroy the Government, and ran up the stars and bars in place of the Stars and Stripes, and when you were fairly beaten on the battle-field, and you fought there bravely I admit, but that exemplified the fact that God and one are a majority. We had Providence on our side and we have now opened the door wide and you are in here and you are so excited, so exhilarated, and, you will allow me to say it without meaning any offense, so drunk with power that you are determined to destroy the last vestige of the bulwarks erected by the republican party in the last eighteen years.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] had a few left-handed compliments to pay to the republican party. He was very mild in comparison with others, and I am glad that he was, because I have been thinking for the last two weeks that if I was to read many of these democratic speeches and repeat their own language I would become tolerably profane. [Laughter.] But Mr. BRIGHT puts it more mildly. After saying a great many things that were not complimentary to the republican party and its operations, he says this:

Here is a prostrate country at your feet.

Of course. Do you not see it? We have done it all. We are the fellows that did all this mischief.

Its condition cannot be laid at the door of the democratic party.

Certainly not. They are as innocent as lambs. They have never done anything bad in all their lives. [Laughter] I wish my friend was in his seat to hear my comments upon his sermon.

Your administration is condemned.

That is what he says. That is not quite so hard as what was said by my other friend. And then he quotes:

Mene, mene, tekel upharsin. You have been weighed in the balance and found wanting.

I quote from his speech. Now, I grant that with the scales you have weighed us in we are found wanting. But then it is not so much the republican party that is wanting as it is the scales that you used. I will remind that gentleman that if he will look at a certain place in an old book which a great many democrats do not read very much—I am sorry my friend from New York, [Mr. COX,] who sometimes reads the Bible to his associates, is not present—if he will look in that old book he will find it written that "a false balance is an abomination to the Lord." [Laughter.] That is the kind of balance you have been weighing us in.

Now, I wonder if I dare say anything about the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN.] [Great laughter.] I am not going to get into any trouble on this score; I am going to ask the Clerk to read from his speech two passages which I have marked. I ask that because it will save me the trouble of doing it, and his voice is better than mine, and then everybody will hear it and they will know that it is not garbled, but properly read. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

I am willing, and those with whom I stand are willing, to accept this issue, and we go further, we tender it. We are the ones to make the issue and we are ready for you to accept it. Planting ourselves upon this broad ground, we welcome controversy. We seek no quarrel with you, but for the first time in eighteen years past the democracy are back in power in both branches of this Legislature, and she proposes to signalize her return to power; she proposes to celebrate her recovery of her long-lost heritage by tearing off these degrading badges of servitude and destroying the machinery of a corrupt and partisan legislation.

We do not intend to stop until we have stricken the last vestige of your war measures from the statute-book, which like these were born of the passions incident to civil strife and looked to the abridgment of the liberty of the citizen.

* * * * * * *

Standing upon such grounds, we intend to deny to the President of this Republic the right to exercise such unconstitutional power. We do not mean to pitch this contest upon ground of objection to him who happens, if not by the grace of God yet by the run of luck, to be administering that office.

I tell you here that if from yonder canvas [pointing to the picture of Washington] the first President of this Republic should step down and resume those powers that the grateful people of an infant Republic conferred upon him as their first Chief Magistrate, if he were here fired by that patriotic ardor that moved him in the earlier and better days of this Republic, to him we would never consent to yield such dangerous and unwarranted powers, to rest the liberties of the citizen upon any one man's discretion, nor would he receive it.

It was not for the earlier but for the later Executives of this Government to grasp and seek to retain such questionable prerogatives. You cannot have it. The issue is made—it is made upon principle, not upon policy. It cannot be abandoned; it will not be surrendered. Standing upon such ground, clothed in such a panoply, resting this case upon the broadest principles of eternal justice, we are content to appeal to the people of this land. There is no tribunal to which we are not willing to carry this case of contest; and we are willing to allow Him who rules the destinies of men to judge between us and give victory to the right.

I do not mean to issue a threat. Unlike the gentleman from Ohio, I disclaim any authority to threaten. But I do mean to say that it is my deliberate conviction that there is not to be found in this majority a single man who will ever consent to abandon one jot or tittle of the faith that is in him. He cannot surrender if he would. I beg you to believe he will not be coerced by threats nor intimidated by parade of power. He must stand upon his conviction and there we will all stand. He who dallies is a dastard, and he who doubts is damned.

Mr. PRICE. Now, in the language that Gratiano used to Shylock, I say to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] "I thank you for that word." I find no fault with the gentleman from Kentucky. I like a brave foe. I believe in a man who walks out in the open field and runs up his banner and fights under it, because I believe he fights for his convictions. And whether he agrees with me or not, I honor him for his honesty in fighting for his convictions.

I want to say to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] and to this House that this is the very speech in substance that I have been making to the people of my district for the last four years. I have told them that if they placed the democratic party in the seats of power in this country, if they again placed in your hands the reins of government as they were in the past, then you would do all in your power to render null and void all the acts of the republican administration that bear upon this question. I believed it then, I believe it now. I believe that while the gentleman from Kentucky makes use of this language he but expresses the very sentiments that nineteen out of every twenty of his party hold, particularly in the South.

I have not garbled the extracts from his speech. I give them entire, paragraph by paragraph, in connection as they occur. I am willing that they should go to the country. I want the people of my section of the country, the two hundred and odd thousand people I try to represent on this floor, to understand that when I told them in the years and days of the past, while I was not a prophet, yet I understood exactly what was to be done.

They think that if they take a good citizen, (and there are good citizens in the democratic party, just as good as there are in any other party; clever gentlemen, good neighbors, honest dollar-and-cent men,) they think that when they take one of that class and elect him on the democratic ticket and send him to Congress he will do just as well as any republican they can send here. I have said to the people in my district—and to show you that I will not say behind your backs what I am afraid to say to your faces, I said to them: take the best democrat in the State of Iowa, and they are just as good there as anywhere—good friends, kind neighbors, honest men in the dollar-and-cent point of view—take the best you have in Iowa, send him to Congress as a democrat elected on a democratic ticket, and he will vote just exactly as the ultra men of the South vote on every question. Am I not right? Who will call that in question? A solid body on that side of the House, and every man of you will vote at the dictation of the democratic caucus!

Will anybody deny that it is dominated by the men of the South? No man dare deny it. You vote solidly together. That is what I tell them at home. Take these men outside of the democratic party, outside of politics, and they are just as good men in many respects as anybody. And these gentlemen from the South are not all bad; I do not say that; they are good social gentlemen; but the very minute you begin to talk about the republican party or reconstruction or any question connected with that, down go their heads, and their horns begin to shake, and they begin to paw the ground. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CHALMERS rose.

Mr. PRICE. I did not interrupt the gentleman. Let us have an open field and a fair fight in this matter. If I tell you anything that is not true you have plenty of time to contradict it. It would be bad policy for me to do anything of that kind if I were so disposed.

This is the position this matter assumes to-day. I will not say it is revolutionary; it is not necessary for me to say that. If it is revolutionary it speaks for itself. I want you gentlemen to understand that you are making capital against yourselves in the country among the people who read and think. All the brains of this country are not in Congress. [Laughter.] There are several men outside these Halls who happen to know something, and they will hold you to a strict responsibility for your action here. If you propose to tear down the bulwarks established by the republican party during the eighteen years of its existence, under which the country has prospered financially and otherwise as no nation on the globe ever did prosper; if you propose to reinaugurate the policy which prevailed before the advent of the republican party to power, and if you expect to receive in this the approbation of the country, you very much miscalculate, you very much mistake the sentiment and judgment of the northern people.

We were willing to give you equal rights and privileges with ourselves. When you came back here, we expected you as a matter of course to come here as equals; but we expected you to abide by the good and wholesome laws that had been established by the republican party and had proven themselves to be good and wholesome in their adminstration during the years of the past when the country was prosperous and happy. The republican party is entitled to more credit than the men of this generation will give it. We will have to wait for posterity to do justice to the republican party. Under circumstances the most unfavorable it took possession of the Government—circumstances under which no other party ever assumed the reins of government. Yet under its administration—I speak it with pride, and if I never have a chance to utter another syllable on the floor of Congress I want it to be remembered—under its administration the republican party did what no other party ever dared try to do: it made the Declaration of Independence a fact, as it never had been before. You know this. You had the power of this Government for fifty years uninterruptedly, and you never attempted to make the Declaration of Independence anything but a theory. It was written in the Declaration of Independence that all men were created equal; that they were endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which were life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. You said that; yet you sold Sambo, and Jane, and Sallie, and John the next day on the auction-block. [A Voice: "How about the Chinese?"] I do not know what they would do with the Chinese; they had not come in then. This republican party will have justice done to it. I know you are b k here in the seats of power for the first time in eighteen years; you hold the reins of government so far as the legislative branches are concerned. I grant you that for the time being a cloud seems to overshadow the prospects of the republican party. But there are rifts in that cloud; and the indications coming from the elections of the last few weeks are that this cloud will shortly break and the republican party come forth strong and bright as ever. The glorious history of the republican party, the measures and the processes introduced and carried forward by it, had begun to make our national horizon radiant; and along that pathway of light thus generated by the republican party we were rapidly working out the problem of man's political salvation.

You boast of your temporary power to-day, but it is slipping from your grasp. You are politically less strong in this House now than you were four years ago, and not very far in the future you will be relegated to your original position, because justice must triumph over wrong, right must triumph over error. It is certain to come. We can afford to wait. Sorrow may endure for a night, but joy will come in the morning. The republican party has learned in the years of the past "to labor and to wait." Those who have looked into eastern history remember that in the years of the past the Parsees stood upon the plains of Persia in the silence and gloom and darkness of night, with faces turned to the east, waiting for the appearance of the object of their worship. Ever and anon through the silent watches of the night, to encourage each other, they would exclaim, "He is coming! He is coming!" And when the king of day rolled up the eastern horizon, walked through the open gates of morning, gilding tree-top and tower, and chasing before him the squadrons of the night, then they burst forth in one simultaneous shout of joy and triumph, "He has come! He has come!" So it will be with the republican party. We can afford to wait. We will wait till the "good time coming," which is not very far in the future. The "sober second thought" of the people is never wrong; it is always efficient; and it will sweep from the seats of power these men who seek now to bring them into bondage; and when the people come to see this as they will, they will erect a monument—no, sir, not a monument only—they will erect a temple to the honor of this party that has accomplished so much for this country. And that temple will reach above the clouds, and will be surmounted, not with the "blue flag," with its legend of Sic semper tyrannis upon it, which was the battle-cry of the assassin who struck down with murderous hand the immortal Lincoln; not that, sir, but that starry banner which floats above your head, Mr. Chairman. It will surmount the summit of that temple, and will be hailed by the peoples of all sections as the flag of our country, the flag of the nation—not of a State, but of an undivided nation; and they will remember that that fact is due to the republican party. And all the people will then rejoice that "the land it floats o'er is as free as the air by which it is fanned." And the gleam of the morning's first beam will light up this temple, making it luminous from turret to foundation-stone with inscriptions declaring that the party in whose honor it was erected were believers in and practicers of the doctrine of the universal brotherhood of man and fatherhood of God.

And all men will then rejoice that the patriotism and devotion to truth and justice exhibited by the republican party through long years of trial and suffering has made it possible to say truthfully today that there is—

No slave-hunt in our borders,
No pirate on our strand;
No shackles on our free soil,
No slave within the land.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Iowa yield the remaining portion of his time?

Mr. PRICE. I will yield it to my colleague.

Mr. SAPP. How much time has my colleague left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has three minutes.

Mr. SAPP. I see the time allotted to my colleague has about expired, and therefore I will not now trespass upon the attention of the House, but will seek another opportunity of getting under the wing of some other gentleman who has time to spare.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to occupy the time of this committee with any elaborate argument on the legislation sought to be repealed by "a tacking on" to this bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government. I shall be as brief as possible in my remarks and confine them entirely to the sections relating to the duties of supervisors and deputy marshals. It is proposed now, Mr. Chairman, to repeal sections 2016, 2018, and 2020, and all of the succeeding sections of statutes down to and including section 2027, also section 5522, and amending sections 2017, 2019, and 2028 as indicated in the bill.

Mr. Chairman, under sections 2011 and 2012 of the bill, entitled The Elective Franchise, two citizens of any city or town having upward of twenty thousand inhabitants desiring any election guarded and scrutinized may make the same known to any judge of the circuit court of the United States, and he will appoint two citizens, residents of the city or town or of the election district or voting precinct, who shall be of different political parties and able to read and write the English language, and who shall be known and designated as supervisors of election; and in addition to these supervisors, section 2021 provides that the marshal for the district in which the city or town having twenty thousand inhabitants or upward shall, for an election at which Representatives or Delegates in Congress are to be chosen, on the application of two citizens residing in such city or town, appoint deputy marshals, whose business shall be, when required, to aid the supervisors. Now, then, under the provisions of these sections, it appears they are only applicable to sixty-nine cities throughout the whole Union, there being just that number of cities exceeding twenty thousand of inhabitants. Section 2022, relating to duties of marshals, sought to be repealed, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] styles the sum of all villainies. He quotes it as follows:

The marshal and his general deputies, and such special deputies, shall keep the peace, and support and protect the supervisors of election in the discharge of their duties, preserve order at such places of registration and at such polls, prevent fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting thereat, or fraudulent conduct on the part of any officer of election, and IMMEDIATELY, either at the place of registration or polling place, or elsewhere, and either before or after registering or voting, to arrest and take into custody, with or without process, any person who commits, or attempts or offers to commit, any of the acts or offenses prohibited herein, or who commits any offense against the laws of the United States. * * * For the purposes of arrest or the preservation of the peace, the supervisors of election shall, in the absence of the marshal's deputies, or if required to assist such deputies, have the same duties and powers as deputy marshals.

But is that the section? No, sir. He has eliminated the qualifying clause, which reads:

But no person shall be arrested without process for any offense not committed in the presence of the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, or of the supervisors of election, or either of them.

Does the gentleman consider that fair, when he says he gives it in its own language, and then does not quote the entire section? And, sir, my colleague, [Mr. COFFROTH,] who addressed the committee yesterday, misrepresents the effect of the section. He says, quoting part of the section:

United States marshals are authorized to appoint deputy marshals, who are authorized, "either at the place of registration or polling place or elsewhere, and either before or after registering or voting, to arrest and take into custody without process any person who commits or attempts or offers to commit any of the acts or offenses prohibited herein, or who commits any offense against the laws of the United States.

And just stops when he comes to the qualifying clause, and then adds:

Sir, it will be seen that this law authorizes the arrest of a citizen without process on the mere whim or caprice of a deputy marshal.

No, sir; I deny it; and the gentleman himself knows that the marshals must witness an open violation of the law, and cannot arrest on whim or caprice, as he asserts. Why, the marshal can just do what any police officer can do; he has authority to arrest summarily in case of an open violation of the law in his presence. This is no wrong. What we want, what we demand, is a fair election, and especially is it necessary for us to provide for fair elections in cities of upward of twenty thousand of inhabitants. Fraud has been practiced in all large cities, and the gentleman from New York has given you some idea of its extent in New York City. We of the North believe in a free ballot. We concede to every man his right to his own opinions, Republicans and democrats alike stand here on common ground. The mass of our people, without regard to political preferences, are both honest and just. In our rural districts we have scarcely an attempt at fraud; but we also know that we do have in all our large cities the rounder and repeater. And I say to northern democrats upon this floor that the order-loving and law-abiding element of the North will not sustain you in your action here in an attempt to destroy the safeguards to a free and honest ballot.

Now, Mr. Chairman, section 4, article 1, of the Constitution says:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Gentlemen say this is not mandatory. Of course not; but you do not deny the right; you cannot deny the right of Congress to say when and where Representatives in Congress shall be voted for. You cannot deny the right of Congress to say that Representatives shall be voted for on separate tickets, and not on slips with candidates for county offices, as is now practiced in some States. You cannot deny the right of Congress to put supervisors and marshals, not only in cities of twenty thousand inhabitants and upward, but in every precinct or polling place throughout the whole Union, if we desire it, when national elections are held.

I say to you gentlemen on the other side of the House that in demanding this repeal and in effecting a repeal as far as you can you are facilitating cheating at the polls. You cannot get away from this conclusion. If you desire fair elections, and have no confidence in the marshals being all of one political faith, why not amend and provide for selection of deputy marshals in equal numbers from both political parties? Equal representation possibly is the reason why you let the supervisors remain, but you propose to take away their efficiency and power; to make them mere witnesses, powerless to prevent fraud. Can you expect, should you expect under such conditions an honest and fair national election? If you cannot do this, then repeal the law as to supervisors. We do not desire the "shadow without the substance."

Now, Mr. Chairman, my friend and colleague [Mr. COFFROTH] in his speech yesterday said:

All the supervisors and deputy marshals were in Philadelphia, except two hundred and seventy-three, and the amount expended in Philadelphia to coerce the voter and keep that city republican was $30,860.

Coerce the voter and keep Philadelphia republican! Only think of it! I am glad, sir, we have this testimony before us taken by the Wallace-Teller investigating committee; I am glad I have an opportunity today to show you from the admissions of these witnesses themselves just what they are as to character, intelligence, and credibility; for, sir, in this warfare made against these sections of the Revised Statutes it has been asserted by democratic papers time and again that stupendous frauds were practiced in Philadelphia and the Wallace-Teller investigating committee would unearth them. But let us first see who these witnesses are who testify before this Wallace committee. First witness is Michael McMurray, the moral man. He testifies in regard to Charles Oliphant, a deputy marshal:

Question. Was he [Oliphant] drunk or sober when you saw him?
Answer. He was drunk in the evening when he came in there, and through the day he was drinking a great deal.
Q. Did you see him drink?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did he go away from the polls to get his liquor?
A. He came into the restaurant and got liquor.
Q. Did he get liquor from you?
A. He got liquor from me.
Q. Do you know whether or not the law or the ordinances required that drinking saloons should be closed on the day of a general election?
A. I heard so; I could not say that it is so; I often heard persons make that remark.
Q. Was your place closed or open?
A. The side door was open.
Q. The front door was closed?
A. The front door was closed.
Q. And you were engaged that day in tending bar?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. You gave liquor to everybody who came after it, did you?
A. Yes, sir.

Now, sir, I submit that here is a man brought before this Wallace committee, at the Girard House, in Philadelphia, to testify against a better man than himself, when he should, according to his own admission, have been down in Moyamensing prison serving a term for violation of the laws of the State for selling liquor on the day of election.

We will for the next witness call the intelligent man, John Printner. He says:

Question. You are a democrat?
Answer. Yes, sir; I have never been anything else but that.
Q. Are you what is called a democratic worker in your ward?
A. I have been called that, yes.
Q. You were at the election at that time distributing tickets?
A. I was there at that time electioneering and distributing tickets; and anything else that I could do I tried to do it.

Q. Did you see any difficulty at the polls on that day other than the one you have referred to?
A. I saw a few little scrimmages that did not amount to anything.
Q. Nothing but what was usual on election day?
A. No, nothing of any importance.
Q. Who was the democratic candidate for governor at that election?
A. Oh, I have no idea.
Q. Who was the democratic candidate for lieutenant-governor?
A. Well, you are taking me clean through the State.
Q. No, I do not take you out of the city of Philadelphia nor out of the twenty-ninth ward.
A. I do not remember now who it was. I have all these things—the papers—at home. I didn't know you were going so far as that with me, or I would have posted myself a little further in the matter—that is, about these other things. I didn't think that there was anything further than our own division that you were going to tax me about.
Q. Who was in your own division the democratic candidate for lieutenant-governor?
A. I could not tell you.
Q. Who was the democratic candidate for State senator in the senatorial district in which you reside?
Q. I cannot give it to you. I have got my memory off from that entirely. I have no memory about that.

We will next call Michael McGinnis, the honest, candid, and fair-minded witness. Hear him:

Question. When you speak of the democratic majority, do you mean to be understood as saying that you know the political feeling there very well?
Answer. Yes, sir; I have been an inside officer.
Q. Have you been an active worker?
A. Yes, sir; all the time.
Q. May I inquire what your age is?
A. My age is twenty-seven years.
Q. So that you have been a voter for six years?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Consequently, in your opinion, as a person very well acquainted with that precinct and a democratic worker, the rights of the democratic party would not be very safe in the hands of this republican State police if they were left to them alone?
A. No; I don't think they would be.
Q. Do you think there ought to be some other authority than this State police there to keep the peace?
A. Yes; if they would get the right kind of men; if they wouldn't work together in that way.
Q. But suppose that these national democrats had the power to appoint the Federal officials, who would come in and see that a fair election was had; then it would be all right; it would be a good thing, would it not?
A. Yes; it would be a good thing if the democrats had the power.
Q. Did you distribute democratic tickets at the November election?
A. I had some tickets in my pocket, and if I would see a friend or any one who would want a ticket I would give one to him.
Q. I ask you if you distributed tickets?
A. Yes.
Q. And you were a United States supervisor?
A. Yes.

It is unnecessary, Mr. Chairman, to comment upon the weight that should be attached to the testimony of this class of men; the testimony speaks for itself; but, sir, I desire to state here the necessary qualifications which entitle every male citizen to a vote in Pennsylvania:

1. He shall have been a citizen of the United States at least one month.
2. He shall have resided in the State one year (or, if having previously been a qualified elector or native-born citizen of the State, he shall have removed therefrom and returned, then six months) immediately preceding the election.
3. He shall have resided in the election district where he shall offer to vote at least two months immediately preceding the election.
4. If twenty-two years of age or upward, he shall have paid, within two years, a State or county tax, which shall have been assessed at least two months, and paid at least one month before the election.

Now, sir, the question is, were any illegal votes cast at the last election in Philadelphia, as has been charged by enemies of the elective franchise law, and, if so, who cast them. First, John Johnson, democrat, cast an illegal vote, by his own admission:

JOHN JOHNSON sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Where did you live at the November election last year?
Answer. At 740 South Twelfth street, Third ward, sixteenth division.
Q. Were you arrested?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. By whom?
A. By a deputy marshal.
Q. Who was the deputy marshal?
A. Roberts.
Q. What were you arrested for?
A. I came up to the poll to vote. He challenged me on my tax receipt
Q. Where did you get your tax receipt? Did you pay the tax?
A. No, sir; it was sent to the house to me.
Q. Did this man Roberts, the marshal, make any threats as to what he would do if you undertook to vote?
A. No, sir.
Q. He just came and arrested you afterwards?
A. Yes.
Q. When they had your examination before the commissioner you were present, were you?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you not remember that the individual in the tax office whose signature purported to be signed to your receipt was brought there to the office, and that he swore that the name attached to your receipt was a forgery?
A. Yes.
Q. Did he do that?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you know who left the receipt at your house?
A. I could not positively say.
Q. You cannot give the name of the person who left it there?
A. His name was McMenamin.
Q. What was his first name?
A. I do not know.
Q. Where does McMenamin live?
A. He belongs to the same precinct.
Q. Is he the same man who was a candidate for city commissioner on the democratic ticket?
A. I do not know.
Q. Was he not arrested for having fraudulent and forged tax-receipts on his person?
A. Not to my knowledge.
Q. You do not know whether he was or not?
A. No, sir.
[After some discussion between the chairman and members of the committee upon the testimony of the witness concerning the genuineness of his tax-receipt, the following was elicited:]
The CHAIRMAN. What do you say as to that?
The WITNESS. The tax receiver's clerk swore that it was not his signature.
Mr. CAMERON. And his is the name that appeared to be on that receipt?
The WITNESS. Yes, but I cannot recall to my recollection what the name was.

Second. Charles F. McCrony, democrat, cast an illegal vote by his own admission.

Question. Did you pay your poll-tax?
Answer. I don't know that I paid it personally myself; but it was paid.
Q. I ask you if you paid it?
A. I did not—not for that election.
Q. Did you have a receipt of the payment of your poll tax?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. When?
A. I always had a receipt with the exception of that time. I had been paying tax on running a wagon, and that was just the same as a tax.
Q. What was your last remark?
A. I had been running a team on the streets of Philadelphia all along, and I calculated that what I paid on that was the same as paying a tax.
Q. You calculated that?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Is that the only tax that you paid?
A. That was the only tax that I paid at that time.

Third. Thomas Hacker, a democratic supervisor of election, cast an illegal vote because he was twenty-two years of age in August and voted the following November, and admits he never paid any tax. He says:

Question. Are you a property-owner in that division?
Answer. I am.
Q. When did you last pay a poll tax prior to the last November election?
A. I have not paid any poll tax; I was only in my twenty-second year.
Q. What is your age now?
A. I will be twenty-three next August.
Q. You were twenty-two last August, were you?
A. I was twenty-two last August.
Q. Did you know that if you were twenty-two years of age or upwards at the time of the election you were not entitled to vote unless you paid a tax?
A. I did not. I thought if you were over twenty-two, that was my idea.
Q. When were you twenty-two?
A. I was twenty-two on the 23d of last August.
Q. Then you were over twenty-two at the time of the last November election?
A. I suppose I was.
Q. When you were outside were you engaged in electioneering?
A. The only thing I was engaged in was holding the window book.
Q. Did you or not distribute democratic tickets to those who wanted them?
A. I guess I did; I would not say positively that I did not.
Q. Then you were engaged in electioneering just as Scott was engaged in electioneering, you for one ticket and he for the other.
A. I suppose so.
Q. Did you not understand that it was your duty as a supervisor to remain inside and watch the poll there?
A. No, sir; the only time that I thought I would have to stand inside was after the polls were closed, and to see the vote counted.

Fourth. Michael Shay, or a repeater calling himself by that name, cast an illegal vote. He was a democrat. Here is Thomas Dwyer's testimony in this matter:

Question. Were you present when a man named Shay came to vote?
Answer. No, sir; but I was coming out of the house and called him back, and asked him what was the matter. He said he had gone up to vote, but could not vote; that the deputy marshal challenged him; and then he went up with me a second time.
Q. What was his name?
A. Michael Shay.
Q. When you then went to the polls what occurred?
A. We went up to the polls, and I vouched that Shay was a qualified voter of the precinct. After I vouched for him he went inside.
Q. Did he vote?
A. He voted. Then the deputy marshal took hold of him. I asked him what he was doing that for, and he said, "I am going to lock him up." I asked him, "What for?" and he said, "Never mind," for me to get away from there, and "I'll lock you up too." I said to him to go around and see if Shay lived where he said he did.
Q. Where did he live?
A. He lived at 243 South Sixth street.
Q. Who owned the house?
A. I don't know.
Q. What was Shay's business?
A. He sells soap for a living.
Q. Is he a married man?
A. Yes, sir; he has children.
Q. How many?
A. A couple, to my knowledge.
Q. Did his wife and children live there at that time?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. They lived at that place?
A. Yes, sir,
Q. For how long had they lived there?
A. Six months, to my knowledge.
Q. Did they make a living, work there?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Was his name on the printed list?
A. His name was not on the list. He lived down in the basement, and they didn't go down there to get his name.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is a very well-known fact that No. 243 South Sixth street is occupied on the first floor by attorneys at law as offices. The name of the janitress is Shay, but she is not married. There is no man by the name of Shay there, nor is the basement occupied as stated by Dwyer, nor has it been occupied by any one.

Fifth. John Devine cast an illegal vote because he voted upon a fraudulent tax receipt, and he was the democratic assessor at the time. Here is his testimony:

Question. What office, if any, did you occupy with reference to the democratic party?
Answer. I held the office of assessor.
Q. Did you pay your poll tax?
A. No; I did not pay it; I don't suppose I did.
Q. You know whether you did or not, do you not?
A. It makes no difference who paid for it as long as I had it.
Q. I am not arguing that with you; I am simply asking you the question; I ask you if you paid it?
A. No, sir.
Q. Have you a receipt for it?
A. I have one down home; I haven't it with me.
Q. When and by whom was it delivered to you?
A. I could not say; it was delivered by a gentleman; I don't know who he was.
Q. When was it delivered to you?
A. Prior to the November election.
Q. How long prior?
A. Two months, or a month.
Q. Will you bring your receipt here to-morrow?
A. Yes, sir.

[A tax receipt was here produced by the witness and offered in evidence by Mr. CAMERON. The following is a copy of the tax receipt, the words and figures in italics indicating the portions in writing, the remainder being a part of the printed form:]

37911.

2nd Ward. PHILADELPHIA, 10—1—1878.

{ City of Philadelphia. } Received of John Devine, FIFTY CENTS, For personal taxes for 1878.

GEO. P. KERN,
For Receiver of Taxes.

J. H. Bryson, 43 S. 4th st., Phila.

John Devine, recalled.
Mr. CAMERON stated that the purpose for which the witness had been recalled, in pursuance of his suggestion to the chairman, was to have identified the tax receipt produced by the witness when previously on the stand.
The CHAIRMAN, (exhibiting tax receipt produced by witness.) Is this your tax receipt?
The WITNESS. Yes, sir.
Q. (By the CHAIRMAN.) It is the one on which you voted at the last November election?
A. Yes, sir.
[A copy of the tax receipt appears in the testimony of the witness when previously called.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, here are no less than five of these witnesses convicted of illegal voting by their own admissions on cross-examination, and out of forty or fifty witnesses called before this committee three-fourths of them democratic supervisors, (ward politicians, active poll-workers,) as they admit; and yet all of these men fail, yes, utterly fail, to name one single man that cast a fraudulent vote at this election, where my friend and colleague [Mr. COFFROTH] says coercion was used to make Philadelphia republican. But I prefer that these democratic supervisors should answer my colleague [Mr. COFFROTH] as to whether force, intimidation, or any other influence was exercised to deprive democrats of their legal votes; for I shall show from their own admissions that not a single democrat entitled to vote at that election was deprived of his right, and also that not a single republican can be named by any one of all the witnesses that voted that day who was not entitled to a vote. Here is the evidence. John Brown, democratic supervior, says:

Question. Did you make a report to the chief supervisor?
Answer. No, sir.
Q. You say you were United States supervisor in that division on that day?
A. Yes, sir; I did not make any report at all.
Q. Give the name of any democrat who was entitled to vote in that division who was prevented from voting on that day?
A. There was not anybody prevented in that division. They are generally pretty well known there and they always have a voucher to vouch for them. I vouch for my neighbor and somebody else vouches for me.
Q. Then, so far as you know, everybody who is legally qualified to vote in the ward and desired to vote had an opportunity to vote?
A. Yes, sir.

The next is Patrick J. McCarthy:

Question. Where do you live?
Answer. In the Second ward, twenty-first division.
Q. Were you at the election poll of that election division on the day of the last November election?
A. Yes, sir. I was United States supervisor.
Q. That division is a democratic division, is it?
A. Yes, sir; by a large majority.
Q. Do you know of any democrats being prevented from voting that day who were authorized to vote?
A. No; there was a general challenge all day, from morning until night; they were all challenged, I believe.
Q. But they all voted?
A. Yes, they all voted; by showing their authority, by getting their papers and tax receipts.
Q. Do you know of any republicans who voted who were not legally qualified to vote?
A. I do not. There are only about thirty-seven or thirty-eight in the whole division.

The next is Felix Campbell:

Question. In what division and ward do you live?
Answer. In the Second ward, twenty-third division.
Q. Did you live there at the last November election?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Were you at the election?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What was your position there?
A. United States supervisor.
Q. Are you a democrat?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you know of any democrats in the division who were legally entitled to vote who were prevented from voting?
A. I do not.
Q. Do you know of any republicans in that division who were legally entitled to vote who were prevented from voting?
A. I do not.

The next in order is John B. Cahill:

Question. What are the politics of your division?
Answer. Democratic. We always roll her up there. We only do two things there, "Mr. Mac," vote the democratic ticket and pray to God Almighty.
Q. Do you tnink you are as effective in praying to God Almighty as you are in voting the democratic ticket?
A. I do.
Q. What are your politics?
A. Red hot. A democrat, I am.
Q. How long have you held the office of constable there?
A. Five or six years.
Q. How long have you been "red hot?"
A. All my life.
Q. Then it struck you in your youth, did it?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What was the democratic vote there in the last November election?
A. I think about 134.
Q. What was the republican vote?
A. About forty-odd; I cannot recollect exactly.
Q. Do you know of any democrats in the division who were legally entitled to vote who were prevented from voting?
A. I do not.
Q. Do you know of any republicans in that division who were legally entitled to vote who were prevented from voting?
A. I do not.

Then we have George F. Benedict, another democratic supervisor, who says on his examination:

Question. What are your politics?
Answer. I am a democrat.
Q. Did you hold any office there?
A. I was supervisor of that division.
Q. You attended to your duties, of course, as faithfully as you could?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you know of any democrat who was entitled to and offered to vote who was prevented from voting?
A. No, sir; ours is a very quiet division.
Q. Do you know of any republican who was not entitled to vote who was permitted to vote?
A. I do not.

Other democratic supervisors testify to the same effect. So it is perfectly clear that force, intimidation, and coercion did not exist at the polling places at the late election in Philadelphia. But my colleague [Mr. COFFROTH] has said that men of the worst class had been selected to act as deputy marshals, and cites the testimony of Charles F. Miller. This man Miller is the private detective of the democratic district attorney of Philadelphia. He says he is a murder detective, his business requiring him to be circulating around and become familiar with all the worst classes of men within the city limits. Yet this man Miller, with all his advantages and superior facilities for learning who the desperate men are, was able to name only eight or nine out of a list of seven hundred and seventy-three deputy marshals that were bad characters, and one of these is Rodney F. Springfield. When asked what was Springfield's reputation, Miller testified that he was tried for killing a colored man, for shooting him, and when cross-examined by Mr. CAMERON was asked the question, "Was he convicted?" and replied, "No, sir, he was acquitted." He was a police officer; Springfield in the discharge of his duties as an officer of the law shot an offender, was tried, and acquitted. Yet this man Miller sought in his direct testimony to convey the impression that Springfield had committed a murder.

Here, Mr. Chairman, I have given very fully the testimony of the chosen witnesses of the Wallace committee. When the proper time arrives, Marshal Kerns, of the eastern district of Pennsylvania, will show to this committee that, notwithstanding Philadelphia is one of the best governed and most law-abiding cities not only in this country but on the face of the civilized globe, no people dwelling in greater security in the peaceable enjoyment of their personal rights and property, possessing an unequaled and certainly an unexcelled police force, a mayor so efficient and so faithful that the good, order-loving people of Philadelphia never tire of re-electing him—notwithstanding I say that Philadelphia possessed all these advantages, it will be clearly shown to this Wallace committee and the country that had it not been for the presence of the deputy marshals and supervisors at the late election in that city, hundreds and hundreds of men would have voted upon fraudulent tax receipts similar to that upon which John Devine cast his vote. Nor am I surprised that some unworthy men succeeded in being appointed deputy marshals. By the admissions of some of these democratic supervisors we must certainly all agree that they, too, were unworthy, for some of them will be shown up as gamblers, ballot-box stuffers, shoulder-hitters, prize-fighters, thieves, professional repeaters, and rounders; and yet if, with some of these unworthy instruments to carry into effect the provisions of the elective franchise law, a fair election was had and a free ballot secured to the legal voters of Philadelphia, I submit, Mr. Chairman, it is only an additional and stronger argument against the repeal of the sections of this law here sought. This Wallace investigating committee, Mr. Chairman, left here on this shearing expedition with high expectations; they have returned to us now bringing, it is true, a little wool as the reward of their labors. But, sir, from the evidence they have submitted to us it is incontestably shown that the entire fleece was shorn from the back of the old bell-wether of the democratic party.

I have been impressed with the belief that there exists on the other side of the House what might appropriately be termed a hyena-like desire to wipe out all the legislation of the past eighteen years. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] says:

But, Mr. Chairman, I am rejoiced to know that the hour of deliverance has come. Could I express my preference in the provisions of this bill, I would not leave upon the statute-book a single vestige of these laws. Could I wipe the dark spot from the nation's escutcheon which they have placed there, could I blot from the memory of man all recollection of them, I should esteem it one of the proudest moments of my life. But fealty to my party teaches me submission to its superior wisdom, and I acquiesce in the partial repeal of the supervisors law, with notice to all concerned that I accept this as only the first installment of justice due to a long-suffering people, and that I shall hereafter claim full payment of the debt by the abrogation of every line, word, and letter of said act.

I admire the gentleman's candor and thank him for his frank avowal. With the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] I believe we will see a systematic attempt to wipe from the statute-books all legislation enacted by the republican party, and if it cannot be done the right way it will be attempted in a wrong way.

Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen on the other side have admitted that as a rule general legislation tacked on appropriation bills should be avoided, but quote precedent to justify them. Even if the republican party has done this thing, it does not make it right. You have precedent for the violation of civil and criminal law in all countries; that does not prove the laws unjust. You have precedent in the violation of all the commands of the decalogue in the records of history; that does not prove their unwisdom. You have given us a precedent for rebellion against this Government, against this Constitution. You do not dare to say that that gives you or any one else the right to rebel again. Article 1, section 1, says all legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States; hence some affect to believe that the President will not stop the wheels of Government by vetoing an appropriation bill simply because it is sought to repeal a law. Whether or not the President will exercise the veto power I do not know. He must answer to his country and his God for his acts, and we trust he will do what is right in his best judgment. Yet, notwithstanding section 1, article 1, gives the legislative power to Congress, practically section 7, article 1, makes the Executive a factor in legislation, because any bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate and is not approved by him, shall be returned, and then a two-thirds vote in both Houses is required before it becomes a law.

It is argued here that because a British king has not exercised the veto power for one hundred and fifty years, the Executive should not; that the two forms of government are analogous. With the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] I deny the analogy. What analogy exists between the House of Lords and the Senate of the United States? What analogy between the sovereign of Great Britain and the Executive of the United States? None. The former is hereditary, the latter chosen by the people every four years. Indeed the Executive is closer to the people than are our Senators; certainly much closer than a hereditary king. Our Executive cannot declare war as does the King, nor has he the kingly power to dissolve the House of Representatives at will as the English sovereign can dissolve Parliament, and which power is exercised. I would remind gentlemen on the other side of the House that if the Chief Magistrate of this nation had such right and would now choose to exercise it your lease of power here would in all probability be just two years shorter than it is now.

The gentleman from Kentucky now in the chair [Mr. BLACKBURN] in his beautiful peroration apostrophized the Father of his Country, and declared that if he should step down from yonder frame and resume those powers that the grateful people of an infant Republic conferred upon him as their first Chief Magistrate, even to him he would never consent to yield dangerous and unwarranted powers. Oh, no; no one here could believe that Washington would ask it, but if it were possible for him to step down in living, breathing, and animated form, it is much more reasonable to believe that he would leaf over his last and best legacy to the American people and address some of the gentlemen on the other side with this paragraph:

"The unity of government which constitutes you one people is also now dear to you. It is justly so, for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence, the support of your tranquillity at home, your peace abroad, of your safety, of your prosperity, of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But as it is easy to foresee that from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed, it is of infinite moment that you should properly estimate the immense value of your National Union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it, accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity, watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety, discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can in any event be abandoned, and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts."

Could you in reply say in the words of the young man in the Scriptures, "All these precepts have I kept from my youth up." What would you say? Oh, what could you say?

Several gentlemen have taken occasion to disavow the sentiments of a certain Mississippi paper quoted from by the gentleman from Maine. But a paper whose character and influence no one will question, the Louisville Courier-Journal, says, "'This is a nation,' solemnly said GARFIELD." We are indeed, Mr. GARFIELD, a nation of States, thirty-eight in number. And is this all; tell us gentlemen of the other side, is that the whole of it? Do you deny that we are forty-five millions of people living under one Government, obeying one Constitution, and recognizing one flag? Do you see nothing above and beyond thirty-eight States? We of the North believe it to be a Union one and indivisible. We have heard in the course of this debate of wrongs and injuries without parallel inflicted upon the unhappy people of this country by the republican party during the period it has shaped legislation. Not one word had we heard of the magnanimity of this great party until the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSE] on yesterday, in his speech, paid a merited tribute to the republican party in these words:

Mr. Chairman I am not unmindful of the fact that the republican party when they were in power passed amnesty laws removing the political disabilities of southern men who had participated in the late civil war and thus rendered them eligible to fill all positions of honor and trust to which their fellow-citizens might see fit to elect them, nor do I seek to detract from the republican party any of the honor that may belong to them for the passage of those laws.

In its desire for peace and harmony and a restored Union it has made it possible for the vice-president of the late confederacy to become a member of this body, also a distinguished member of the Jeff Davis cabinet, as well as scores of men who struck at the flag of their country and who put forth their best efforts to trail it in dishonor—all these are here now avowing exalted devotion to the Constitution and the Union. In regard to this action of the republican party it is possibly not yet the proper time to speak, but God forbid that history should record this great magnanimity as the most grievous error that shall be laid at the door of the grandest political party that ever existed among a free people.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I shall not commence my remarks on this occasion by quoting from a hymn:

From many an ancient river,
From many a sunny plain,
They're marching to diskiver
The links in error's chain.

[Great laughter and applause.]

Having said precisely what I do not intend to do, I ask the committee to listen to what I do intend to do. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, during the progress of the discussion on the Army appropriation bill, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE]—I dislike to call anybody's name in this House, because it is not precisely parliamentary—addressed the House in an impassioned speech, in which, among other things, he alleged that there were no free elections in the South, because the white people, who were in the main democrats, by violence and intimidation, controlled the blacks into subjection to their will. This charge constituted the gravamen of the gentleman's speech. During it he took occasion to indulge in some spiteful and uncharitable animadversions upon the conduct of his own race, in the South, which, to my mind, were not entirely becoming in one of his ability and position. Appeals were made by him to feelings engendered during the late unfortunate civil war, which it was supposed ended nearly fifteen years ago, and whose bitter memories it is not the part of wisdom, statesmanship, nobility of soul, or even courage, to revive and excite. The language of the gentleman was so sweeping and comprehensive that I felt it to be a duty which I owed to the State, one of whose Representatives I have the honor to be, to ask if he meant to charge that the alleged offenses which he was denouncing (the violation of the freedom of the ballot) were committed in the State of North Carolina. I wanted a "bill of particulars," because I thought common fairness required it. Instead of answering the question in that manly way which his brave words would have led one to expect, he resorted to what I conceived to be an evasion, and responded, inferentially at least, that these outrages were less common in the State of North Carolina, because of the number of white republicans who lived in it. Inasmuch as this answer clearly involved the charge that fear, and not a desire to observe the law, nor a regard for the duties and obligations of good citizenship, controlled our people, I pressed the gentleman for a specific reply, when, as he ought to have done, he withdrew the imputation. As this was practically all the vindication which I desired, I chose not to pursue the subject further, but to allow others whose constituents had been assailed to come to the defense of their own people.

Mr. FRYE. Will the gentleman allow me a minute?

Mr. STEELE. Oh, yes; certainly I will.

Mr. FRYE. I was profoundly ignorant when the gentleman asked me the question he did in relation to the history of North Carolina in connection with these matters under discussion. I have since that time been investigating the history of that State, and I now feel entirely able to say to him, and entirely able to satisfy the country, if I could get fifteen or twenty minutes at any time in which to do it, that North Carolina ought not to be exempted at all; that murders and outrages were as frequent there as in many other States; that "moonshiners" abound there in great plenty; and that it takes the Army to enforce even the revenue laws; and by and by, if I get a few minutes, I will devote such portion of the time as gentlemen feel inclined to listen, to North Carolina.

Mr. STEELE. "Angels and ministers of grace defend us!" [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine need not to have made an acknowledgment upon the floor of this House of his ignorance in certain particulars; for charity would suppose that was the cause, rather than something else, of his remarks. That is all I have to say upon that point.

Not long after this a member of this House, and I shall not specify the State for reasons which are satisfactory to myself, who made his appearance upon the floor for the first time about a month ago, being, as I suppose, "gorged with statesmanship," [laughter,] as another member was once characterized by one of his colleagues, proceeded, doubtless to his own great gratification, to disgorge himself of something which was very much removed from statesmanship, but closely allied to that which is far less elevated and noble. If it is true that "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh"—I believe that is Scripture; if it is not, my reverend friend from Iowa will correct me——

Mr. PRICE made a remark which was not heard.

Mr. STEELE. I presume the gentleman's remark was pretty good, but I did not hear it. That member's heart is overflowing with the gall of human unkindness, and he shows a chivalry in words, in a time of peace, which I suspect far surpassed his heroic deeds when armed men were engaged in deadly strife. He vauntingly calls my attention to certain volumes in the Library of Congress, whose record, he tells us, is "like the history of hell and the proceedings of the damned." I confess, Mr. Chairman, that I do not know anything of the similitude, having no knowledge, nor a desire to have any, of the "history" and "proceedings" to which the member so familiarly refers. [Laughter.] I shall not say, Mr. Chairman, that this member came from the State of Iowa. I take it for granted, however, that he has been a close student and an attentive observer of a region of which he professes such extraordinary knowledge, and I do not see how he acquired such an intimate acquaintance except by a personal visit, which enabled him to become a medium for the disclosure of "the unnumbered horrors which hang around the second death." That is from a hymn, too. [Laughter.] Having had the advantage of a personal visit to the dominions over which reigns the monarch of all evil, I trust he will not soon again "to sulphurous and tormenting flames render up himself," but remain awhile on this earth for the purpose of warning sinners against the awful realities of the place of the damned. [Laughter.]

I was not ignorant, Mr. Chairman, of the existence of the volumes to which my attention was directed, nor was I entirely unadvised of the character and purposes of the investigation which called them into being. I know, too, not a little of the credibility of the witnesses, who, as a general thing, were summoned by the ostensible authors of the inquiry to speak in regard to the subject-matter of the investigation. Most of it was gone into by the high court of impeachment of North Carolina in the trial of Governor Holden for "high crimes and misdemeanors in office," a trial where the people and the respondent were both represented by eminent counsel, and which was conducted with the utmost fairness. The respondent was convicted, and among the other offenses for which he was tried, and for which judgment was rendered against him, was, that he had suspended the writ of habeas corpus, which the constitution declared should never be suspended. All that the testimony did disclose was that there had been outrages upon the persons of citizens of the State, but there was no evidence that any one had been deprived of his constitutional right to vote as he pleased. That is the question, and no other, which the amendments under consideration make it proper to discuss. But since the Member has so needlessly thrust the matter before the House, with a view only to inflame the passions of the people of his section of country against those who he knows are unable to defend themselves, except "with bated breath," I beg leave to submit a few observations, intended only to "vindicate the truth of history."

Under the Constitution of the United States, as it existed prior to the adoption of certain amendments, the States had the indisputable power "to regulate the internal government and police thereof" and to admit to the privileges of the ballot such of their people as they might regard the proper custodians of this highest prerogative of citizenship. It belonged exclusively to them to fix the qualifications of electors. But party necessities made it desirable that this right should be overthrown; and to effect it the Constitution was ruthlessly trampled under foot by those who had solemnly sworn to support it. This was the greatest outrage upon the freedom of the ballot which was ever committed in this country, and they who did it, and they who apologize for it, ought in very shame to "put their hands on their mouths and their mouths in the dust." It does not become them to speak of the glories of a free ballot. All their laudations are the most transparent of mockeries. However, the deed was done; the amendments are a part of the Constitution—not by the free will of the people of the South, who were lawfully entitled to determine it, but by their acquiescence and submission. That acquiescence and submission give them all the vitality which they possess. Notwithstanding the "questionable shape" in which they were inserted, they are now, by the means which I have indicated, as much parts of it as if adopted according to the methods prescribed. We of the South regard them as entitled to our respect and obedience, and yield to them a patriotic submission, because "interest reipublicæ, ut sit finis litium." We trust that their provisions, as well as all others of the Constitution, will be carried out in their letter and spirit.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. STEELE. Yes; but I do not promise that I will answer it.

Mr. HUMPHREY. You can do as you please about that. I ask the gentleman this question: he says that the amendments to the Constitution are entitled to their force and effect from the acquiescence and submission on the part of the southern people?

Mr. STEELE. Oh, no; I do not say that.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Excuse me; I so understood it.

Mr. STEELE. My friend is too good a lawyer not to understand what I mean.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I wanted to ask the gentleman if that is what he said?

Mr. STEELE. You know what I meant, and you know, and every lawyer who knows anything about constitutional law knows, that some things having their origin in wrong, fraud, and force, yet, by the submission of the people to them, have become the law of the land.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes; but only when they have their origin in the eternal fitness of things.

Mr. STEELE. Oh, yes; John Bunyan, or somebody else. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREY. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. STEELE. Not now.

Under the new order of things produced by these changes of the Constitution, the patience of the people of the Southern States was tried to the very verge of forbearance. A swarm of hungry political vultures, with all the hateful characteristics of that—

> Wee blastit wonner,
> Detestit, shunned by saunt and sinner.

whose appearance on the "miss's fine Lunardi," at the church, gave Burns the opportunity of writing some of his finest lines, came flocking to the South, to gorge their ravenous carcases upon what little the ravages of the war had left. Professing an ardent love for the newly-made citizen, these creatures soon wormed their way into his confidence and thus possessed themselves of the lucrative offices of States in which they really never intended to remain, except so long as the hope of plunder offered a temptation. These are the beings who bear the enticing and suggestive name of "carpet-bagger." Notwithstanding the assertion often made to the contrary by those who either did not know the facts or who willfully perverted them, the term was never applied by our people to any honest citizen of the North who removed to the South to make himself a part of the people, ready to bear their burdens and participate in their joys. These are always welcomed. Under the baleful influence of the adventurers whom I have named, every department of the government of the States which they infested became corrupt. The legislative was largely composed of the ignorant and depraved, the executive was often filled by aliens with no feelings in common with the people, and the judicial disgraced by men who either knew nothing of the law which they were called upon to administer, or were so malignant and venal, that justice was frequently either "sold, denied or delayed."

In my own State there were some honorable exceptions, and these I do not intend to include in my statement. Of our judges I shall speak of but two—one a native, as much opposed to granting suffrage to the negro as any one, until he found that he could profit by it and get a position for which everybody knew neither his learning nor his character fitted him; and the other a "carpet-bagger" of no ordinary ability, but believed by nine-tenths of our intelligent people to be totally destitute of principle, and moved only "by the instigations of the devil and his own evil passions." In the two districts presided over by these men the courts failed to do justice to such a degree that in an evil hour some indiscreet men, in their very despair, took the administration of the law into their own hands; and, having done so, often committed grave violations of the very provisions which they assumed to enforce.

I am not the advocate of the "higher law," regarding it always as a dangerous experiment and often productive of evils of greater magnitude than those which it proposes to remedy. In one of these districts, composed in part of some of the counties which I represent—where the "masked ruffians" lived, as they are sometimes called—the members of the bar, without regard to party affiliations, held a meeting and unanimously agreed upon a memorial to the General Assembly of the State, which was intended by them to be the foundation of articles of impeachment against the judge, in which it was distinctly charged that his incompetency was so glaring that his conduct tended to increase, and did increase, rather than diminish crime. His stupidity was so great that I have understood it was said, and I believe that it was said, that a prominent judge of his own party (I will not say he was from the bench of the supreme court) declared of him, that, "like an owl, he was blind in proportion to the light shed upon him." [Great laughter.]

It was in these two districts "where sin was robed in ermine and in gold," and for these causes, and no others, which I have indicated, that the organization known as the ku-klux had its origin, mostly flourished, and exercised in the main its unlawful prerogatives. It is error to charge that it was composed exclusively of democrats. In nearly every case where this band inflicted the punishments which the courts failed to impose, acting upon the principle that "diseases desperately grown by desperate appliances are relieved," the evidence is overwhelming that the parties upon whom its avenging hand was brought down, had been guilty of offenses against the criminal law, and some of these offenses were felonies of the highest grades. In a few of them the persons punished had used their power to harass unoffending citizens and subject them to outrages under the forms of legal prosecutions without the hope of legal redress. It would have been far better, I admit, had a suffering people been content to have borne longer the "weary life" to which they were subjected, and trusted in a final vindication, when the goddess of justice once more became seated upon her throne. But the infirmities of human nature are not confined to one State nor one section of the country, and they who accuse our people of wrong are not always guiltless themselves. They should be careful how they "throw the first stone."

The case to which the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] alluded a few days ago only demonstrates that even in the latter State the public patience is sometimes exhausted and wreaks swift-footed vengeance, because it is unwilling to await "the law's delay." It is by no means a solitary instance, as every one who has read the newspapers of this city within the last few days will recollect. What is known as "Lynch law" is administered now and then in every State of the Union, and will be administered, despite all conservative teachings, so long as murder, arson, burglary, and all the other felonies continue to be committed. These will doubtless take place until the arrival of that happy period, apparently very far in the future, when universal peace shall spread her white wings over the earth, and "the leopard shall lie down with the kid, and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together, and a little child shall lead them."

When these offenses occur in the South they are ascribed to political feeling by those whose joy it is to "laugh at our calamities and mock when our fear cometh." When at the North they are either overlooked by partisans, whose only desire is to make political capital, or attributed to the passions which are the inheritance of frail mortality. If a negro is maltreated or killed in our section, whatever may have been the provocation, even such as referred to by the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. HASKELL,] whether murder, arson, or rape, tears of sympathy are shed over his fate, "as fast as the Arabian trees their medicinal gum," by those whose only feeling for him is a selfish wish to use him as "a hewer of wood and drawer of water," for their political enjoyment.

In their excessive zeal for him, most generally hollow and pretentious, the mere "trappings of woe," there is no tender chord of feeling to be touched for the people of that race, "greatly wrought, perplexed in the extreme" by the treatment which they receive, which kindled and fed the fires of civilization that have sent their gladsome light to illumine the darkness of earth.

What I have said in regard to the causes which contributed largely to the infractions of the public peace in my own State can, I doubt not, be truthfully said of similar occurrences in the other States of the South. Where judges, whose duty it is to administer the law as it is written, shall so discharge their official functions that no good citizen can have cause to complain, the law will be respected and easily enforced; for then there is confidence that its strong arm will be used to protect and defend the persons and property of all the people. But "thieves for their robbery have authority when judges steal themselves;" and if the bench becomes either so ignorant or corrupt that faith in the pure administration of justice shall fail, it need surprise no one if the evil example shall be followed to the partial or entire dethronement of the law and the substitution of violence in its stead. The favorite policy of the republican party, to keep up its control in the country and at the same time insult and degrade the white people of the South—a policy, as I have said, based upon an acknowledged violation of the Constitution—resulted, as every thoughtful man must have known it would result, in placing in authority over the lives and liberties of our people quite a number of men entirely unfitted to hold the scales of justice, and who never would have held them but for the abnormal condition of affairs which party madness and fanaticism and malignity created. The natural fruits of such a stupendous outrage upon "truth, justice, and the Constitution" came in due course of time, and the wonder is that the "abused patience" of the people was quiet so long. The very men who had imposed these heavy burdens upon us themselves would not have exhibited the forbearance which was shown by the helpless victims of their political malice. The act was not one of genuine courage or lofty statesmanship or generous humanity; and now, when the purpose has failed, when the fruit which was expected to have the taste of nectar has "turned to ashes," the authors of the wrong, in their desperation, charge that the natural law which makes intelligence control ignorance is unnatural and revolutionary. To induce the negro to be still longer subsidiary to their purposes, these very persons are now enticing him away, under delusive and fraudulent hopes and representations, from a climate and pursuits to which he is accustomed into a strange and inhospitable land, that he may add to the political strength of another section of country. That is all the object, and they will get tired of it, I predict. [Laughter and applause.]

Among other reasons given for the maintenance of an offensive surveillance over the actions of the southern people—offensive because it comes in conflict with the traditions and practices of the fathers and presupposes criminal intent on our part—is that we need subjugating into the propriety of allowing the free exercise of opinion among us. It is alleged that we are intolerant of any differences on the part of those who were educated under other influences and under what is pharisaically called a higher civilization than the one beneath whose shadow we were reared. We are told, and the country is told, (for what purpose is apparent to every intelligent man,) that the southern democracy place under the ban of their social displeasure all who settle among them and entertain political views not in accordance with their own; and hence the necessity of our being taught by Federal authority that humility on our part is essential to the full development of the changed condition of affairs. Doubtless some weak-minded and timorous men believe these stories; but no one who is well informed can be so extraordinarily credulous. The same causes which would render a southern man odious to the northern people if he should settle among them would unquestionably operate to produce unpleasant relations in the South. Men who are new residents anywhere, if wise, will always exercise prudence and be careful not to wound the sensibilities or even prejudices of their neighbors. If a citizen of Alabama should remove to Maine, and shortly after his arrival should stand up in the market-place and indulge in censorious criticisms upon the manners, customs, and language of the natives, contrasting with them the superior condition which existed in his mother State, he would be sure to excite bad blood and bring upon himself the ill-will and even the maledictions of those upon whom his animadversions were made. [Applause.] They would probably think that he would act more discreetly if he waited a little longer before indulging in his lectures; or they might treat him with contempt as a fool. Whatever might be his opinions, if he exercised good sense and proper forbearance for their supposed follies and ignorances and showed himself in sympathy with their interests he would command respect, and his peculiar views, when they learned them, would be tolerated as the outgrowth of a defective education, subject to change by the superior intelligence of his surroundings. [Laughter.] If this is true, need any one be astonished if the same sensitiveness to supposed arrogance on the one hand and hope for reformation on the other should exist at the South?

The danger of maltreatment is purely ideal. We welcome all immigrants who come to be citizens and help us to develop the resources of our country and add to its wealth, prosperity, and happiness. But we do not want patent statesmen—persons who are distrusted and worthless where they were raised, but who, so soon as they snuff our balmy air, undergo a sudden metamorphosis and robe themselves in the gorgeous paraphernalia of statesmanship. The honest settler at the South who exercises a reasonable share of good sense and who has merit will never complain of the treatment which he receives at the hands of our people.

On the 15th of January of the present year a convention of northern settlers in the South assembled in the city of Charlotte, in my district—a place somewhat famous for the declaration of independence in May, 1775—in pursuance of the following circular-letter of invitation, written by a native of Massachusetts, now a citizen of Charlotte:

CHARLOTTE, NORTH CAROLINA,
December 14, 1878.

DEAR SIR: I have consulted with a number of gentlemen who have moved from New York, New Hampshire, and other Northern States and settled in this State, South Carolina, and Georgia since the war, many of them ex-Union soldiers; I myself am from Springfield, Massachusetts. The conclusion we have arrived at is that northern men who have settled in the South have in their hands the solution of the question as to whether any considerable number of good northern men and active northern capital can be diverted to the South. Many of the northern papers are giving wrong notions as to how northern people are received. You know many of our friends will not put much faith in what southern men or papers say on this head. We who have consulted upon this matter deem it wise to hold a convention of northern men only who have settled South since the war—good, fair, representative men. Your name has been given as such a one. It is thought wise to hold this convention about January 15, at Charlotte, North Carolina, it being more central for all. Arrangements have been made with the railroads for the round trip at one fare. Will you be kind enough to signify if you will come or not, and if you cannot come, please address me a letter stating your views. It is desired in the convention to prepare a statement for publication in northern papers, setting forth the soil, climate, prices, ease of making a living and social treatment of the individual northern man. It is not desired to cover any question of politics or extreme views of any kind.

In your letter, whether of acceptance or declination, please state if you were in the Federal Army, company, and regiment; where you moved from to your present residence, and how long you have resided at your present whereabouts.

We shall be glad to hear from you at the earliest day.

Your obedient servant,

N. DUMONT,
Charlotte, North Carolina.

The author of this letter is personally known to the gentleman who represents the Springfield district of Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON,] and he can say whether he is a respectable man. He commands the respect of our people who know him, not only on account of the general propriety of his conduct but because of the interest which he manifests in the prosperity of our section of country. This convention was attended by about eighty persons of northern birth who have become citizens of the South since the close of the late war, who after consultation among themselves made among others, the following "findings," which I commend to the consideration of all fair-minded and candid men, believing them to be a complete refutation of the slanders which are uttered against the people of the South:

First. That in the States of our former homes there exists an active prejudice against the South and its people; that this prejudice is mighty in its influence for evil on the nation; that by it and through it the conditions of the country are largely disquieted; that it is fomented and kept alive for ends ulterior to the common weal; that the real interests of the nation are kept out of sight in keeping alive this prejudice; that much of this prejuice, if not all of it, is due mainly to wrong information concerning (and partial and total ignorance of) the facts existing in a large portion of the South.

Second. That in the portions of the South in which we reside the right of any man, from no matter where, to express publicly as well as privately his opinion upon any subject and of every nature is nowhere and in no manner restrained; that all laws are well administered and as truly enforced against the wrong-doer as in any part of any State of the Union.

Third. That any man who has so conducted himself at his former home as to win the regard of honest men and decent people, by pursuing the same course of life in the South, does gain and keep the regard and respect of all people regardless of any question of politics or religious faith; and we further find that being a northern man is certainly no disadvantage.

Fourth. That every citizen recognizes that he is amenable to the law, and that local self-government is as much required and encroachments upon these as much deplored as in any State North, East, or West.

Fifth. We find, too, that persons foisted themselves upon the polity of the South, and by their conduct cast discredit upon the northern name

Sixth. Those of us who were in the Army of the Union never for a moment pretended to think of denying our uniform or the old cause. The confederate soldier has always evinced the true soldier instinct in the grasp of those who were his enemies in war.

Seventh. That considering reputed outrages, if these were carefully sifted it will be found that the complainants for like acts would have suffered at the hands of any people under like provocation.

BUSINESS AND SOCIAL RELATIONS.

Eighth. We find that in business relations the ex-confederate is willing to sell his land on time to northern men, even to people who could not get the same accommodations at the North, East, or West. We find, too, that in the ramifications of business they indorse our notes and bank paper, and are not over-anxious or inquisitive on questions of extension, and they frequently say, "It is as much our interest as yours that you should succeed and by your success help fill the country with thrifty people."

Ninth. That as neighbors they visit our firesides and welcome us to the privileges of public worship and sympathize in our sorrows and afflictions; that they admire sturdy integrity and real principle; that their definition of what these things are corresponds with the idea of the same our neighbors in the North held in common with us. We find that we are not tabooed nor subjected to any kind of persecution for proper conduct or good northern ideas or principles, and though differing from many of our southern neighbors on many essential questions in politics and otherwise, we have lived and prospered here among them, they knowing these differences.

I should be glad to give the names and residences of all the parties who drew up and signed these "findings," but time will not permit it. Among them is Rev. Dr. Mattoon, president of Biddle University, at Charlotte, a colored institution, who removed from the State of New York—a gentleman of talents and culture and esteemed by all who know his character and virtues. The other signers are persons who emigrated from Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, and other Northern and Northwestern States, [laughter,] who all testify without hesitation that the injurious allegations which are so often made as to the South are utterly untrue, and they aver that the persons and property of all classes of people are quite as secure in that section as in any other part of the American Union.

Mr. ARMFIELD. Was one named Conger? [Laughter.]

Mr. STEELE. I am asked whether one was named Conger. That was the name of one of them; there is no doubt of it. [Laughter.]

In addition to the conclusions reached by the convention, quite a number of letters were received by Mr. Dumont from persons of northern birth, and all concur in one emphatic vindication. Many of these gentlemen were soldiers in the Federal Army—not sutlers, contractors, paymasters, or wordy warriors—and like brave men who gave unmistakable evidence of their convictions by placing themselves in front of hostile armies, they show their appreciation of the character of those who were equally sincere by avouching for the truthfulness of their declarations when they laid aside the habiliments of war. The great bulk of the courageous men who encountered the dangers of the battle-field were rejoiced when the trump of mortal strife had ceased to be heard, and hoped that lasting peace would prevail in the land. With them the war ended when the South laid down her arms and furled the flag which she had borne with chivalric heroism for four long and weary years. They scorned to strike further a fallen foe, preferring rather to lift him up, take him kindly back to the old mansion, and joyfully renew the pledges of friendship which had been broken by human frailty and deep conviction. Like the eagle, they were ready to strike while the enemy stood living and defiant before them, but too proud, too noble, too brave, to assault one who had "dropped from his nerveless grasp the shattered spear." We know and history will tell who they are that have acted the part of "vampires and worms." [Applause.]

What is the evidence to sustain the charge that the public voice is stifled in the South? Only this: the South is democratic notwithstanding the number of negro voters who are in it. The argument is, that the negro is naturally, and in gratitude ought to be, a factor for the success of the republican party; that he would do as he ought to do, (and as it was intended he should do,) if not prevented by fraud or force; that the democrats use fraud and force, or members would come to Congress from the South who would serve the purposes of the republican leaders. It is certain that during the "carpet-bag" and bayonet dynasty of the South the bulk of the members from our section were not its representatives. Having no interest there, except to hold office, the "carpet-bag" element was only so much additional strength to the States from which it had seemingly emigrated. Now, our members are identified with their own people and they do not sell themselves like some of their predecessors for their private emolument. But could any one suppose, did any one ever suppose, that the negro when the ballot was placed in his hands had the intelligence to govern himself, and that he would not become the mere instrument in the hands of others to work out the purposes of the superior power? So long as aliens controlled him and made him register their decrees no complaint was uttered by the Pharisees that he was operated upon by falsehood and fraud, and sometimes even by threats and force. Now, when that overshadowing power is gone, and gone too by the influence of natural laws which all reflecting men knew would at last resume their sway, great indignation is uttered. It is not the fraud which hurts, but only the result of the elections.

But if the negro at the South is naturally a republican, I desire to know if the white man of the South is not naturally a democrat? [Laughter.] If the negro is acting unnaturally and for false reasons who votes or is voted the democratic ticket, is not the southern white man acting unnaturally and for false reasons who votes the republican ticket? It is simply a Roland for an Oliver in that case. Now, it is well known that nine-tenths of the white natives of the South are democrats, whatever may have been their former party differences. As ignorance should be controlled by intelligence for the public benefit, I submit it to the candor of northern men whether it is not better that nine educated men rather than one should exercise the superior influence? It is not to be supposed that a few persons, and they not our most intelligent people, should understand more thoroughly the interests of one of the best sections of this country than the great body of the native population who received freedom and full citizenship as an inheritance from their ancestors. The presumption would be utterly idle and puerile.

But besides this, there are reasons readily understood by all why the negro has become tired of the rule of his pretended friends. Many of them are beginning to see that the ballot was placed in their hands not for their protection, but for the sole purpose of keeping some other persons in power. When they have wanted office they have found that the small portion of the white race who acted with them could readily furnish all the official material, while they were left to do the voting. And I have known some instances where they were nominated by the republican party where they stood no chance of election. [Laughter.] I do not say that ever occurred in this House. [Laughter.] They have learned, too, that despite all the falsehoods and inflammatory appeals which have been made to delude them, whenever they need any substantial aid it is to be obtained almost entirely from those against whom they have been placed in an unnatural antagonism, their pretended friends "keeping the word of promise to the ear and breaking it to the hope," and like the "juggling fiends" in Macbeth they should "no longer be believed." They have comprehended, too, that labor and not statesmanship is their calling, and they must work while their professing friends are rioting on the fat of official position. Naturally, the negro would act with his former master, and everybody knows it who knows anything of his character. It required fraud and force and fear artfully applied to change the natural law. And now, after years of strain against it, the normal condition is returning. What have been the consequences? Since the brain and character of the South have resumed their legitimate and proper sway the dark clouds of corruption and distress which hung like a pall over the Southern States during the night of bayonet and "carpet-bag" rule are drifting away, and the sunlight of peace and contentment and happiness is sending its glorious rays to adorn and bless and gladden the land.

I need not tell any southern man what took place in nearly all of their States during the dark days of what is euphemistically called republican rule. It is a black page in the history of this Government. When did free elections come in Arkansas, Tennessee, and even in Missouri? How long were many of the very best men in these States disfranchised for no other reason than because they would not vote to keep tyrants and plunderers in office? In two of these States the governor had a power which no monarch in Europe possesses. Why, sir, in the county in which lives my excellent friend, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. ATKINS,] having a male population over the age of twenty-one years of about three thousand, the voters were reduced to a few hundreds by arbitrary and tyrannical power, and one of these few hundreds told me that he was restored to the ballot by a subscription to the Knoxville Whig, a newspaper owned by the governor of the State; in other words, he paid $2 for it. Free elections, indeed! The republican party a party of a free ballot! Its whole history as connected with the South demonstrates that that was precisely what it did not want, and what it intended to prevent. A party of justice! Why, sir, under the third section of the fourteenth article of the Constitution it is well known that party favoritism was almost invariably extended to those only who showed penance by shouting hosannas to the republican party. The party of personal liberty and manhood suffrage! Its legislation for the past fourteen years shows that it has sought rather to protect the rich and grind down the poor. Under the guise of "honest money" this party has organized and carried into practice a policy for the benefit of overgrown wealth, and to the great injury of the debtor and laboring classes of the country.

But then, Mr. Chairman, the alarm is sounded by the "truly loyal," and especially by that portion of them who "cried havoc and let slip the dogs of war," while they remained at a safe distance far in the rear and "out of the shot and danger" of mortal strife, that the "confederate brigadiers" are getting too numerous in this Hall for the peace and weal of the country. Is it that which is feared? "'Twere damnation to think so base a thought." No, no, Mr. Chairman, it is the democrat who is feared, and he is feared, not for the sake of the country, but because he endangers the continued rule of the republican party. The "confederate brigadiers" who allied themselves with that party are not only harmless, but the very quintessence of patriotism. They can be trusted as Cabinet officers and foreign ministers and Federal judges. Loyalty to that party is loyalty to the Constitution in the eyes of these loyal brigadiers of the bomb-proof department, who omit no opportunity, now when the battle is over and the foe has laid down his arms, to exhibit the valor of Falstaff over the dead body of Percy, or that of the plumed knight of the ridge-pole after his wife had killed the bear. [Laughter.]

We of the South yearn anxiously for peace and harmony and complete fraternization. We want personal liberty and the preservation of all the constitutional rights of all the citizens of the country. Whatever may have been our sins we have paid a penalty sufficiently severe for the boon of condonation. When we see some of our trusted leaders in that heroic struggle in which we staked our fortunes and lost all but our honor placed in high official position by the party whose leaders hurl such fierce anathemas at us and continually remind us of our offenses, we cannot help asking if we were any more steeped in crime than they who now flourish in all the glories and bask in the sunshine of high trust and distinguished responsibility. What is the difference? Our only solution of the perplexing problem is that these have shouted "Great is Diana of the Ephesians;" great is the republican party, while we have not learned to become such suppliant devotees. Shall the material interests of the country suffer by neglect while those who should direct their energies toward their advancement are spending their time in assaulting "castles in the air," dangers which exist only in their diseased imaginations? We have no peace, because the party which assails us lives only upon sectional strife and sectional hatred, and means never to allow the wounds of the late unhappy war to heal so long as they shall serve to minister to their political ascendency. Such conduct brings nothing but woe to the country; and under all the circumstances such conduct brave men ought to be ashamed to exhibit.

No people under the sun have more reason to desire good government than the democrats of the South. Every interest which they have demands it. Their hope of regaining the prosperity which was lost by the war and providing the means of supporting their families and educating their children, and of the security of their persons and their estates, requires them to be the advocates of law and order, freedom and justice. We ardently desire "domestic tranquillity" and "the blessings of liberty to us and our posterity." These cannot be maintained by armed soldiers or the emblems of our degradation standing around the polls; for both of them, while they are ostensibly used to uphold, will inevitably destroy free institutions. Let the presumption of innocence prevail; let our people understand that they are to be treated simply as the equals of all other people in this model Republic; that their honor is not assailed by Federal intervention, and elections will not only be free, but the liberties of the country, whenever assailed, will have defenders who will come to the rescue from love and not as slaves to carry out the will of their masters. Remove all badges of our humiliation; and if the evil day shall ever come when the moloch of despotism shall assail the altars of freedom, the men of the South will stand, with all other liberty-loving men, as "a wall of fire" for their protection. [Great applause.]

Mr. BAILEY obtained the floor.

Mr. STEELE. I believe I have a few moments remaining, and I will yield them to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. McKENZIE.]

Mr. McKENZIE addressed the committee. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. I am permitted by the courtesy of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAILEY] to say that I understand that my colleague who has just taken his seat [Mr STEELE] has made several allusions to me. What those allusions were I do not know because I did not hear them. I desire merely to say that I shall hereafter ascertain what those allusions were, and if I deem it necessary I shall make a reply thereto.

Mr. STEELE. What is that which the gentleman says?

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. I was merely saying that I am going to read the RECORD on you, and you can read it on me. I do not know whether certain allusions made in your speech were to me or not.

Mr. STEELE. They were not, and I will relieve my colleague, for I distinctly excluded him from my reference to the other two judges.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. I did not understand my colleague, and there appears to be some misunderstanding among gentlemen on this side of the House.

Mr. STEELE. When my colleague reads my speech he will find that in that reference I made my colleague an honorable exception.

Mr. CLYMER. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAILEY] will yield for that purpose I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. BAILEY. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. CLYMER. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CLAFLIN, for four days, on account of important business; and

To Mr. KELLEY, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. MYERS, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of papers in the case of Jefferson Kinder; no adverse report.

On motion of Mr. BAYNE, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the cases of Samuel C. Schoyer and James M. Boreland; no adverse reports.

Mr. STONE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WHITE. Pending that motion, I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next. [Loud cries of "Oh, no!"] Well, I make the motion.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. FRYE. There is no need of that.

Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina. Very well; if the gentleman thinks there is no need of it I will not insist upon the demand.

The question was taken on Mr. WHITE'S motion; and on a division there were—ayes 38, noes 67.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The question was then taken on Mr. STONE'S motion, and it was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, April 21, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MAXEY presented the petition of L. D. Covington and others, citizens of Fannin County, Texas, praying for the establishment of a post-route from Monkstown, in that county, to Cooper, in Delta County; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of Moses G. Farmer, praying for the passage of an act extending the reissued patents Nos. 6296 and 5181 for a period of seven years from August 31, 1879, and November 15, 1880, the dates when they respectively expire; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. VEST presented resolutions of the Merchants' Exchange of Saint Louis, Missouri, in favor of a commercial treaty with France; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CARPENTER presented the petition of Matthew O'Regan, late of Company E, Third United States Artillery, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BECK (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 449) in relation to the Washington Market Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MAXEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 450) to establish a circuit court of the United States in and for the State of Texas, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 451) to reimburse the Creek orphan fund; which was read twice by its title, and, together with the papers on file relating to the case, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. GROVER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 452) for the relief of Priscilla Watson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 453) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to fit a new propeller to the United States torpedo-boat Alarm, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HAMLIN (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 454) to provide for the erection of a monument at the Naval Cemetery at Annapolis, Maryland, in commemoration of the officers and others who perished by the wreck of the United States steamer Huron; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HARRIS (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 455) for the relief of Reuben S. Jones; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 456) for the relief of Alston M. Boyd and Rufus P. Walt; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 457) for the relief of Lucinda McGuire; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask an order to be made in all these cases that the papers on file be withdrawn and referred to the Committee on Claims with the bills just introduced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Have there been adverse reports?

Mr. HARRIS. There has been no report in the last case that I am aware of. In the first two cases the order ought to be made upon leaving copies in accordance with the rules. As I have introduced the bills by request, and do not know in the first two cases if there have been adverse reports, I want the rule to be applied.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The orders will be made, and the rule requiring copies to be left will be observed if there has been an adverse report.

Mr. COCKRELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 458) to authorize a preliminary examination and survey of the passes between the affluents of the Upper Missouri and Columbia rivers for the purpose of asctrtaining the distances between the navigable waters of said rivers and the practicability of uniting said rivers by canal or otherwise; which was read twice by its title, and, together with the papers on file relating to the case, referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard.

Mr. VOORHEES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 459) for the relief of Elizabeth B. Custer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 460) to ascertain and determine the title to the tract of land known as the Rancho Panoche Grande, in the State of California; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 461) granting an increase of pension to Elmer A. Snow; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WALKER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 462) for the relief of William Byers, of Batesville, Arkansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 463) to amend section 688 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 18th instant approved and signed the following act and joint resolutions:

An act (S. No. 55) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to contract for the purchase or construction of a refrigerating ship for the disinfection of vessels and cargoes, and for other purposes;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 17) authorizing the printing of a portrait of the late Joseph Henry, to accompany the memorial volume heretofore ordered; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 20) relating to the organization of the National Board of Health.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

Mr. GROVER. I ask the following order to be made; there has been no report in the case:

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Colonel Thomas Worthington be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be made.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, submitted the following order:

Ordered, That the papers be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the committees hereafter named in the following cases, namely:

John W. Chickering—to the Committee on Military Affairs.
Patrick Sullivan—to the Committee on Military Affairs.
John L. Williams—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.
Dabney Walker—to the Committee on Claims.
Sewell B. Corbett—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. No adverse report has been made in any of the cases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there has been no adverse report, the order will be made.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that I shall ask to be heard to-morrow morning, as soon as the morning business of the Senate is concluded. I should have asked the same privilege on Thursday or Friday of last week if the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] had been in his seat. As my friend from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] will go on with his remarks on the Army appropriation bill this morning, I shall ask the Senate to hear me to-morrow morning immediately after the ordinary morning business of the Senate.

APPOINTMENT AND REMOVAL OF SENATE EMPLOYÉS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no further routine business, the Chair lays before the Senate the resolution offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] on the 17th instant, to amend the standing order of the Senate relating to the appointment and removal of the employés of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I notice that the Senator from Pennsylvania who has the resolution in charge is not in his seat, and I am told that he is not in the city. Therefore I ask that it be laid aside and that the regular order be taken up, as the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] is prepared to speak on that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia asks that the resolution be informally passed over, as the Chair understands.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Without losing its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without losing its place.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. And I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senate resumes the consideration of its unfinished business.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. BLAINE to the sixth section of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the pending question the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GARLAND. On last Friday when I made the motion for an executive session it was not with a view of getting the floor to address the Senate upon the pending question, although I expect before the debate closes to make some remarks upon it. As other Senators have signified that they prefer to go on to-day, I yield the floor for that purpose to the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.]

Mr. BAYARD. I am thankful for the courtesy of my friend from Arkansas.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the bill before the Senate is the usual annual bill "making appropriations for the support of the Army of the United States for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1880, and for other purposes." The amount appropriated by this bill is in round numbers $27,000,000. I believe that every demand of the military service is amply supplied by the bill. Nothing is withheld that would tend to promote the efficiency and usefulness of this honorable branch of the public service. But it is evident that the discussion of the bill has been accomplished in this body and elsewhere with an unusual degree of feeling. A deep but I do not consider too deep an expression of interest has been apparent.

In this discussion I shall deprecate anything like an appeal to passion. I know how much more quick is the response whether of challenge or approval where passion can be invoked, and I know how much more feeble is the response to the appeals to reason. Yet I have none to make except to reason. I propose to advance no doctrine intended for a sectional influence. I propose to say nothing that shall not be addressed to all parties, to everybody within the broad limits of our country who is a friend to constitutional republican government.

By the Constitution in its first article and eighth section all the power delegated to the Federal Government by the States in relation to erecting military establishments is to be found. The power is given to Congress—

To raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years.
To provide and maintain a navy.

But there is no limit to the duration of the appropriation for that branch of the military service. Next:

To make rules for the Government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

These are clustered, they may be said to be coupled in their arrangement, as they must be in their execution.

It is to be noted that the restriction for the appropriation to maintain an army is to two years; and by our unbroken custom since the foundation of the Government, which has hardened into law, the appropriation is but for a single year. Note well, then, that a standing army, a permanent institution, was never to exist, but that its duration was limited at the outside to two years, and that every two years at the furthest recurrence was had as to the advisability of its continuance.

But let us look further. I turn to the second article of the amendments to the Constitution. These articles of amendment may be called conditions concurrent to the adoption of the Constitution, because, to use the language of the convention of the great State of New York, it was only "in full confidence" that these ten articles of amendment, restrictive of the power of the Government of the Union, would be adopted that the Constitution was approved by that and by other States. Indeed in some cases the condition was absolutely annexed to their ratification. The second article of these amendments provides that—

A well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of THE PEOPLE to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

Note, I beg of you, Senators, that while there is a restriction as to time for the existence and the appropriation to continue the employment of the Army, there is to be no restriction at any time upon the right of each State to be secured by its own militia, and of THE PEOPLE at all times and forever during the existence of this Government to bear arms. That was never to be infringed. Therefore military establishments of the Union, it will be plain, were intended to exist and be dependent only upon the consent of Congress, given from year to year.

It is well when we are examining these fundamental principles which lie at the very basis of our system of government, that we should heed those counselors from whose virtues and mighty intellects this Government sprang. In the twenth-sixth number of the Federalist, (page 172 in the copy from which I read,) Mr. Hamilton tells us distinctly that—

The power of raising armies at all, under those constitutions—

That is, the State constitutions—

can by no construction be deemed to reside anywhere else than in the Legislatures themselves; and it was superfluous, if not absurd, to declare that a matter should not be done without the consent of a body which alone had the power of doing it.

Then, said he, in considering the armies of the Union:

The Legislature of the United States will be obliged, by this provision, once at least in every two years, to deliberate upon the propriety of keeping a military force on foot; to come to a new resolution on the point; and to declare their sense of the matter by a formal vote in the face of their constituents. They are not at liberty to vest in the executive department permanent funds for the support of an army, if they were even incautious enough to be willing to repose in it so improper a confidence.

Again in the fortieth number of the Federalist he says:

Next to the effectual establishment of the Union, the best possible precaution against danger from standing armies is a limitation of the term for which revenue may be appropriated to their support. This precaution has prudently added. I will not repeat here the observations which I flatter myself have placed this subject in a just and satisfactory light.

Referring to the danger expressed lest two years might be too long a period, and that there was not the safety which was found in the provision of the English system, which required an annual appropriation for the continuance of the Army, he says:

Ought not suspicion herself to blush, in pretending that the Representatives of the United States, elected freely by the whole body of the people, every second year, cannot be safely intrusted with a discretion over such appropriations, expressly limited to the short period of two years?

And I find here by his hand in italicized letters emphasis given to the words "elected freely by the whole body of the people, every second year;" because he was referring to the originating power of the Constitution vested in the House of Representatives over all bills providing money for the support of the Government. It is therefore in the discretion of the House of Representatives that the origination of measures necessary for the continuance of the Army is deposited.

I am aware that there have been allegations of irregularity in the attachment of measures of general legislation upon appropriation bills. I am not sure that such charge has not been abandoned in the present case. If it has not been abandoned a slight examination will show that it is wholly groundless.

I am ready to concede, first, the constitutionality, but, next, the impropriety of encumbering ordinarily appropriation bills with provisions of general legislation of an extraneous character. I do not propose at this moment to discuss that question further than to reiterate the statements which I have often made in deprecation of such a practice. But by the very nature of things no such reasoning or objection applies to the bill now before the Senate to which such objection is sought to be affixed. By the very nature of things supplies to keep on foot an army must be accompanied with rules for the regulation of the army. Every expense of an army can only be measured by the uses to which it is to be put. You cannot appropriate for the expense without measuring and limiting the use. The two are inseparable. There is, therefore, no bill which can be devised which shall provide regulations for the employment of the army so fitly as the bill which provides money to support it in executing its duties. Each must be taken into consideration. The expenses of the army are based upon estimates. Estimates are based upon the intended uses and occupation of the force. Expenses in war are infinitely greater than in peace, and all expense of every nature depends upon and must be measured by the exigency contemplated. This is only common sense. You cannot appropriate money for an expense without measuring and estimating the cost of executing the duty proposed; and therefore it is that upon this bill, and upon no other bill, regulations for the use of the armies of the United States must be framed, and in our history of legislation have generally been found.

Let me refer to the intelligent results of the labors of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] in the speech that he made on the 14th of April on this subject. He had made a thorough examination of the statute-book, in order to find what proportion of legislation concerning the Army of a general and permanent nature, had been enacted upon appropriation bills, and he discovered, that in the present revision of the statutes from sections 1094 to 1361, inclusive, the number of sections under the title of "The Army" is two hundred and sixty-eight. Of these ninety-two were derived directly from appropriation acts, including acts appropriating for the support of the Army, sundry civil, consular and diplomatic, Military Academy, and fortifications. Thus it appears that more than one-third of the general and permanent provisions of law regarding the Army were enacted upon appropriation bills prior to 1874. But, in fact, the proportion was much more than one-half, because many other sections were derived from acts consolidating the statutes in relation to the Army, passed from time to time, beginning at an early day in our legislation, which statutes were derived in great part from provisions attached to previous appropriation bills. These permanent and general provisions of law derived from appropriation bills, were passed upon such in the various years extending from 1832 down to 1873, and the greater part of such legislation on appropriation bills was enacted, as he says, under the rule of the republican party.

I may say further that had time been given me, I could have shown that in a branch of the public service military in its nature, and in regard to which the chief expenses of our Army are incurred, in the Indian appropriation bills, the great body of general legislation in respect of the Indian tribes and their control is to be found upon appropriation bills of money to carry out our stipulations and control of that people.

How idle, then, Mr. President, is it in the face of history, and how unworthy and untrue is the cry of revolution raised for merely party ends to alarm the anxieties of the country, when such amendments so thoroughly germane to the subject, so indissolubly connected with the execution of the appropriations, in the course of the regular administration of the Government according to its parliamentary rules and unbroken custom, are now proposed to be enacted into law. I do not believe that the American people are at all in a humor to seek for unrealities, or that they will not resent in their good sense all such hollow and insincere alarms. I believe they will be resented by the country, and that they will recoil upon those who would seek to make them causes of discord and contention, and deprive the country of that rest and opportunity for recuperation which we all feel to be so much needed.

Equally unjust and absurd in the cry of coercion. Parliamentary rules of order and the composition of our own Government are alike disregarded in search of this mere political capital. I know of no grosser impropriety in parliamentary procedure; I know of no more manifest breach of the rules of order, than introducing statements in debate in either House of Congress intended to affect the determination of subjects, whether that influence is of the executive branch or whether it be the influence of the co-ordinate House of Congress.

See upon this subject what has been said. I read from section 1714 of the Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies by Cushing:

1714. It is considered, and with reason, so important that each branch of the legislature should act with entire independence, that it is regarded as irregular and disorderly, to attempt to promote or oppose any measure, by stating the proceedings in reference to the same or a similar measure, in the other branch; as for example, to say, that "if the gentleman who made the motion had been informed of what had passed in the House of Lords the preceding day he never would have made that motion as he knew no bill could pass without the Lords;" that "he should bring in just such another bill with the amendments, and then gentlemen who meant to oppose it should recollect that it had passed that house without even a division, and that it had passed the House of Lords without any or with very little opposition;" or, to speak of the large majority by which this bill had been carried, in the other house of Parliament.

1715. III. It is also highly irregular to introduce the name of the sovereign in debate, for the purpose of influencing the determination of the house, for two reasons: first, because the sovereign cannot be supposed to have a private opinion apart from and independent of the responsible advisers of the Crown, and therefore the private opinion of the sovereign is of no more account than that of any other individual; and, secondly, because the sovereign, acting under and with the advice of the constitutional and responsible advisers of the Crown, cannot participate in any such manner in the functions of legislation.

1716. The legislative power of the sovereign is defined with admirable force and clearness in the remonstrance of the Lords and Commons addressed to Charles I, 16th December, 1641, in which they declare:—"That it is their ancient and undoubted right that your majesty ought not to take notice of any matter in agitation and debate, in either of the houses of Parliament, but by their information or agreement; and that your majesty ought not to propound any condition, provision, or limitation, to any bill or act in debate or preparation in either house of Parliament, or to manifest or declare your consent or dissent, approbation or dislike, of the same, before it be presented to your majesty in due course of Parliament; and that every particular member of either house hath free liberty of speech to propound or debate any matter, according to the order and course of Parliament; and that your majesty ought not to conceive displeasure against any man for such opinions and propositions as shall be in such debate; it belonging to the several houses of Parliament respectively to judge and determine such errors and offenses, which, in words or actions, shall be committed by any of their members, in the handling or debating any matters there depending."

1717. In accordance with the constitutional doctrine here laid down, the Commons, on the 17th December, 1783, resolved:—"That it is now necessary to declare, that to report any opinion or pretended opinion of his majesty, upon any bill or other proceeding depending in either House of Parliament, with a view to influence the votes of the members, is a high crime and misdemeanor, derogatory to the honor of the Crown, a breach of the fundamental privileges of Parliament, and subversive of the constitution of this country."

1718. It is, therefore, an established rule, which is strictly adhered to, in spirit as well as in letter, in both branches, that no member shall introduce any mention of the name of the sovereign in debate, in such a manner as to interfere with the freedom of debate, or for the purpose of influencing the determination of the house, or the votes of the members, in reference to any matter pending in Parliament.

Then he passed on to give instances of the strictness with which this rule has been upheld, and in the note of the American editor, he says:

It seems hardly necessary to observe that what is said in the foregoing chapter concerning the sovereign is applicable in this country to the executive branches of our several governments.

And there is a long foot-note of authorities in which reference to the pleasure or the displeasure of the Executive in respect of any pending measure is held to be highly disorderly. Therefore it is that I have listened with amazement and strong disapproval to the numerous attempts made in this debate on the other side of the Chamber directly to coerce senatorial opinion by threatening us with what may be the action of the executive department of the Government. I hold that no rule is plainer than that the safety of our Government is dependent upon the just independency of its various departments. The powers of Congress are theirs alone; the powers of the Executive are his alone. The responsibility for the action of each rests upon each alone. It cannot be divested, and it cannot be used excepting wrongfully and improperly, out of its appropriate sphere.

Mr. President, whether we are exercising our powers or whether officers of other departments of the Government are exercising their powers, let it not be forgotten that the spirit of administration must be the same in all to avoid conflict and confusion. The Government must be administered in all its parts, under the great rule of construction, that every power must be so exerted as to accomplish the one great object for which it and all other powers were delegated and vested in any department of the Government or any officer thereof. That great object being to keep in view always the perpetuation and continuance of free republican government.

The spirit of comity and just administration can alone be relied on to prevent collision and jar between the great departments of the Federal Government itself, as well as between the Government of the Union and those of the several States. Critics of the philosophy and structure of our Government have often observed that one of its infirmities consisted in the Constitution being in writing, arguing that therefore it lacked that elasticity or flexibility which would enable it under pressure to give way temporarily without breaking its ties; in other words that it could not be chained down, without injury, to a mere frame of words when the principles underlying its exercise would equally have been secured and respected by a liberal construction of its meaning. Let those therefore who would administer this Government by its letter and not its spirit, remember that rigid inflexibility of phrase and letter will often prove as destructive of its just ends and as disastrous as loose disregard of its forms of expression.

As I have shown, Congress in its sphere is vested with power to declare war, to levy supplies, to raise armies, and regulate and control them. The President of the United States, the chief of the executive branch of the Government, is ex officio the Commander-in-Chief of the armies; but he can neither abridge nor interfere with any of the powers of Congress over this subject. It was for the safety of the country and the people, that the power to raise armies and regulate their use was given into a different hand from that which was to command them when they had been raised. I hold that any construction of the Constitution that gives to the Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United States legislative control over their existence, their composition, or regulation, tends to defeat the great rule of liberty intended to be secured by the subdivision and distribution of powers.

The executive power of course extends to the nomination of all officers of the United States, civil and military, but beyond this he has no authority or control over the members and composition of the Army. I do not omit section 7 of the first article of the Constitution, which requires that every order, resolution, or vote to which the consent of the two Houses is necessary (except a resolution to adjourn) shall be approved by the President; but I do mean to call attention to the fact that the intent and spirit of the Constitution was to prevent the discretionary power to raise armies and regulate their use from being deposited in that official who was also to be their commander-in-chief.

So thinking, let me come to the proposed regulation of the Army which is contained in the present bill, and which has been made the subject of such violent denunciation coupled with so many dark threats. Section 6 of this bill is the only part that I understand is objected to. It provides:

That section 2002 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows.

Here let me say that by the law as it now stands, in amending regulations whether of the Army or of the Navy or of the Indian department, in making any amendment to the existing law, it is required that the section so amended shall be printed in the form in which it will read when amended.

"No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States: Provided, That nothing contained in this section, as now amended, shall be held or deemed to abridge or affect the duty or power of the President of the United States, under section 5297 of the Revised Statutes, enacted under and to enable the United States to comply with section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States, on application of the Legislature or executive, as provided for in said section."

And that section 5528 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"Every officer of the Army or Navy, or other person in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, who orders, brings, keeps, or has under his authority or control any troops or armed men at any place where a general or special election is held in any State, unless such force be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States, shall be fined not more than $5,000, and suffer imprisonment at hard labor not less than three months nor more than five years."

These are the provisions objected to. The only difference between the regulations as they now stand upon the statute-book and those proposed by this bill are that now the Army may be brought, by any civil or military officer of the United States, "to keep the peace at the polls." The regulation proposed in this bill by the House of Representatives for the Army of the United States is simply that it shall not be employed to keep the peace at the polls; that is all. It is on the two sides of this question that the two parties seem to have arrayed themselves.

In February last the House of Representatives passed and sent to the Senate, a bill identical in substance and in form with the bill now under consideration, excepting the provisions now inserted, carefully providing that the duty and power of the Executive to suppress domestic insurrection in the States on the call of the Legislature or governor thereof, shall not be abridged. Then, as now, the democratic majority in the House said to the Senate "here we tender you a bill providing for the maintenance of the Army in all respects amply and fully, for the coming year; but we couple with it this regulation that it shall not be employed to keep the peace at the polls of election in the several States." The answer of the republican Senate on the 3d of March last, without debate and with no reason given at any time that appears by the record was, "we will not have an Army in the United States on such terms; it shall be used to keep the peace at the polls or it shall not exist. If we cannot use it at the polls we will suffer it to be disbanded for want of supplies." There was at that time no cry made that I am aware of that the regulation proposed by the House of Representatives was revolutionary or unjust. It was simply the will of the republican majority in the Senate that the regulation should not be adopted. In proof that there was no principle contended for by that majority, look at the act approved by the President on the 18th day of June, 1878. See section 15 of that act, containing what is called the posse comitatus clause, that the Army of the United States—I speak from memory as to its substance—should not be liable to be called on except under the express provisions of law to be used as a posse comitatus, and imposed a punishment by fine upon the officer disobeying it. In March, 1877, the House of Representatives, then, as now, in the control of the democratic majority, passed an Army appropriation bill with a clause forbidding the use of the Army as a posse comitatus, and a republican Senate deliberately voted that there should be no Army unless it could be used as a posse comitatus; and, standing upon the constitutional exercise of their powers, the republican majority in the Senate defeated the Army appropriation bill, and it became necessary for the President to convene Congress in extra session in the month of October following.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me? I do not understand that the defeat of the Army bill in March, 1877, rested at all upon the idea that the Army could not be used as a posse comitatus, but it rested upon a section in that bill which declared that the President of the United States should not use that Army to maintain State governments in States of this Union; and it was upon that difference of opinion between the Senate and the House that the Army bill failed in March, 1877.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I had intended to have that bill referred to before me; and therefore, as to the fact which is so easy of arbitration between the honorable Senator and myself, say that as at present advised I do not concur with him. The history of that case shows that a bill originating in the House of Representatives was passed, almost at once upon the reconvention of Congress, for the relief of the suffering officers and soldiers of the Army, who had been deprived of their pay since the 30th of June of that year, and that, on the 18th day of June, 1878, the bill as proposed in March, 1877, by the House of Representatives was passed by the Senate on a yea-and-nay vote and met the prompt approval of the Executive, thereby becoming a law and now standing upon the statute-book. We heard nothing on that occasion of coercion, because there was none, and there is none now; and yet the exercise of this discretion by the House was then as positive and specific in the Army appropriation bill in June, 1878, which was passed by a republican Senate and signed by the President, as is the law now proposed. In fact there was more reasonable ground for discussion in that case than there can be found in the present. Let me ask from those around me more familiar with the appropriation bills and the Army bills than I, whether an amendment proposing an entire reorganization of the Army was not put upon the appropriation bill by the then majority of the Senate upon the application of my honorable friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURNSIDE.] Is not that so?

Mr. WITHERS. That was put on in the House.

Mr. BAYARD. It was put on in the House, but it came before the Senate and as I recollect no objection to its regularity came from any quarter. The only thing said, and said by me among others, was that I hoped that upon an appropriation bill, without time for examination, we should not conclude so important a question, but that we should postpone it for six months that we might examine it, for all had not either knowledge or the opportunity which the gentlemen of the special committee who had studied the question and who by the way had never communicated their views by a report had had, that they having enjoyed greater opportunities, we should have time to learn the value of their reasons; but as to anything like irregularity because it was general legislation of the most reformatory character connected with the Army, not one word was raised and not one objection came from any source. The only question was the convenience of considering so important a subject in the short time allotted to us before the adjournment. I believe I state that correctly.

But, Mr. President, there are rules and regulations which neither Congress nor the President nor both combined have, in my judgment, the power to impose upon the Army of the United States. It is not lawful and it cannot be made lawful for a government depending upon the elective action of its people for its existence, in time of peace to bring to the place of holding an election an armed force. The very presence of force is inconsistent with free choice. It is but stating a truism, too palpable to need repetition, to say that to choose means to choose voluntarily, and not involuntarily; that a choice which is not free is no choice. An election is but a choice, and an election which is not free is no election. If an Administration which depends for the perpetuation of its power upon popular election can, under pretense of keeping the peace or anything else, intrude the element of force at the polls to influence in any degree the will of the citizen, then it has struck a fatal blow at the very root of popular government.

Some propositions are too clear to be debated, they are so strong in their simple statement as to have no need of discussion. Daniel Webster spoke of certain popular rights as "fireside rights," that no man could safely suffer to be drawn into question, and the right of the people peaceably to assemble and hold their elections free and undismayed by the presence of armed force or by the threat of armed force or intimidation under any pretense whatever, is an essential right without which all others are insecure. Election-day is the one day of freedom, the day of days for the citizen. If a man may not be free on that day he shall be a slave for the remaining days of the year. On that day comes the opportunity to retrieve mistakes, to inaugurate reform, to redress grievances, to withdraw power that has been abused, the day to which men of law-abiding spirit look forward with patient endurance of present evils because it is the day of their deliverance. Sir, it is the day when power is to return to the people from whom it emanated, or it may never return. Free election is the great safety-valve of human discontent; it is the wise substitute of our forefathers for desperate and forcible revolt of misery against the oppressions of constituted authority. Election day brings the ruler back to judgment at the hands of his people, to be deprived of his temporary power or to receive renewed expression of public confidence. Read what Blackstone says in his Commentaries upon the necessity for absolute freedom in elections—this text-book of free government, this book that forms the chief lesson put in the hands of every man who would understand and obey the spirit of the laws of a free country:

As it is essential to the very being of Parliament that elections should be absolutely free, therefore all undue influences upon the electors are illegal and strongly prohibited; for Mr. Locke ranks it among those breaches of trust in the executive magistrate which, according to his notions, amount to a dissolution of the government, if he employs the force, treasure, and offices of the society to corrupt the representatives, or openly to pre-engage the electors, and prescribe what manner of persons shall be chosen. For thus to regulate candidates and electors, and new-model the ways of election, what is it (says he) but to cut up the government by the roots, and poison the very fountain of public security? As soon, therefore, as the time and place of election, either in counties or boroughs, are fixed, all soldiers quartered in the place are to remove, at least one day before the election, to the distance of two miles or more, and not to return till one day after the poll is ended.

Mr. President, if the use of the armies, the employment of the force, the treasure, and the offices of society "is to cut up government by the roots and poison the very fountain of public security," what an illustration of this danger have we not steadily witnessed in this country in the past few years! Two years ago, in the elections of 1876, we saw a Cabinet officer, the chairman of the executive committee of one of the great parties, using his official power, his influence, his time, and so of every officer under him, for the purpose of controlling the elections in favor of the party to which he was attached. All the way down the official grade it was so. An officer who sat at a desk in the Senate was employed in like manner, as was shown by the circular produced here and read the other day. And yet how carefully did our fathers seek to guard against this very danger! Look at the constitutional provisions on the subject. Everywhere and all through this charter are to be found the most impressive proofs that they carefully intended that power, intrusted to officials for the benefit of all, should not be used as stepping-stones for their advancement or the perpetuation of power in their hands; and therefore it was that when the provisions were inserted in the Constitution to provide for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President it was expressly restricted:

But no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

What was the design of that provision but that constitutional power intrusted to the hands of officials for the benefit of all should not be used for the benefit of one party alone? See also the provision of section 6 of the first article, that—

No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States, shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office.

For what was that intended except to prevent men in power from using that power corruptly for their personal benefit and advantage? The same thing in regard to the office of President of the United States. It is provided that he shall receive a sum that shall neither be increased nor diminished during his term. Not increased, why? Because he might use his official power for the purpose of procuring it. All these things combine to show that the influence of power intrusted into the hands of the Administration for the general public welfare, cannot with safety and should not lawfully be employed for the purpose of advancing the interest of one portion or one party in this Union against the other.

Sir, I was sent the other day a letter published by an historian of the Constitution, whose erudition, ability, and research give weight to what he says wherever he is known—Mr. George Ticknor Curtis, of New York—from whose letter I will read this extract:

Upon these theories—

Referring to the power and duty of the Federal Government to interfere in elections in the States—

Upon these theories a practice has grown up of stationing Federal troops at the polls—a practice, the anticipation of which, if it could have been foreseen when the Constitution was framed, we may be sure would not only have prevented the introduction of the clause above quoted, but would have rendered the establishment of any national constitution an impossibility. I know not whence the advocates and partisans of this practice derive the power so to use the Army of the United States. If they seek for it in the clause relating to Federal elections, they seek it in a place where every sound constitutional lawyer will tell them it is not to be found. They ought to know that no people have long tolerated such a practice and preserved their liberties. It is the very practice by which the French Republic in our own times was converted into an empire, and it cannot go on in this Republic without sooner or later leading to the same kind of result. It matters not in whose hands the executive power may be. If one party can wield such a weapon, another party can adopt it in turn; and between them, in their struggles for supremacy, our liberties will be overthrown.

I ask the Senate to consider, if such jealousy in regard to free elections is exhibited under a monarchical government as Blackstone has described, where the executive power is permanent and transmissible from ancestor to heir by inheritance, and when the inducement for executive interference would be so much lessened, by reason of the fact that the possession of executive power is permanent and incapable of disturbance, how infinitely greater becomes the necessity in an elective form of government like our own, where power is not permanent nor hereditary and was not intended to be permanent, but always limited by terms of duration, that those to whom it has been temporarily intrusted should not use their official power to perpetuate their control and authority over their fellow-citizens! Look at every charter of the colonies; look at the constitution of every State, and see spread all over them the doctrine that without the consent of their Legislature no armed force shall exist in their midst. Look at every provision in regard to the freedom of elections, and can you not see everywhere a stern demand, an inexorable necessity for the existence of a republican government that elections shall be free, and that the force of the community shall never exist except in the harness of the law, arranged and fitted by the law-making power. In the early constitution of that little Commonwealth which it is my pride and honor partly to represent on this floor, I find this doctrine plainly given, in no jealousy of the power of the government, but in jealousy of Liberty when endangered in any quarter. The constitution of 1776 provided in article 28:

ART. 28. To prevent any violence or force being used at the said elections no persons shall come armed to any of them, and no muster of the militia shall be made on that day; nor shall any battalion or company give in their votes immediately succeeding each other, if any other voter, who offers to vote, objects thereto, nor shall any battalion or company, in the pay of the continent, or of this or any other State, be suffered to remain at the time and place of holding the said elections, nor within one mile of the said places respectively, for twenty-four hours before the opening of said elections, nor within twenty-four hours after the same are closed, so as in any manner to impede the freely and conveniently carrying on the said election: Provided, always, That every elector may, in a peaceable and orderly manner, give in his vote on the said day of election.

Such, sir, was the exhibition of feeling of that early day; and shall it be said that we have retrograded? Shall we own that where the power has so infinitely increased that may threaten us, our anxieties or our duties have been lessened in a converse proportion? Go back, sir, into the pure and wholesome air of the earlier history of the State of New Jersey and read from the records of her colonial struggle to secure civil liberty, as related the other day by the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH.] The history of American government in all the charters and constitutions of the States is marked by the design to perpetuate liberty by means of free and constantly recurring elections; and in the light of such a record of every State and of the Government of the United States, I hold that the law of any State or of the United States that authorizes the presence of the armed forces of a State or of the United States—any armed force, I care not what—at the polls of a popular election, is a law leveled at free government, it is a blow at freedom itself; it is impossible for it to have any other object or result; and if there be those who shall be so blind as to believe that force at election and freedom can exist together, they will awaken soon to a sad realization of their mistake.

There is no greater man, and there are few utterances of that man more impressive to the American people than those of Daniel Webster in his oration upon the completion of the monument upon the battle-ground of Bunker Hill. It is a good time to read them now. There was at that time profound peace in the country. Few men of that day had taken part in armed struggles. The few veterans who surrounded him on that occasion were the survivors of the war of 1812, and that as we know was not waged upon the soil of Massachusetts. Let me repeat what he there said:

> Quite too frequent resort is made to military force; and quite too much of the substance of the people is consumed in maintaining armies, not for defense against foreign aggression, but for enforcing obedience to domestic authority. Standing armies are the oppressive instruments for governing the people, in the hands of hereditary and arbitrary monarchs. A military republic, a government founded on mock elections, and supported only by the sword, is a movement indeed, but a retrograde and disastrous movement, from the regular and old-fashioned monarchical systems. If men would enjoy the blessings of republican government, they must govern themselves by reason, by mutual counsel and consultation, by a sense and feeling of general interest, and by the acquiescence of the minority in the will of the majority, properly expressed; and, above all, the military must be kept, according to the language of our bill of rights, in strict subordination to the civil authority. Wherever this lesson is not both learned and practiced, there can be no political freedom. Absurd, preposterous is it, a scoff and a satire on free forms of constitutional liberty, for frames of government to be prescribed by military leaders, and the right of suffrage to be exercised at the point of the sword.—Works of Daniel Webster, volume 1, pages 98 and 99.

We were told the other day that there was no danger of such interference, and the honorable Senator from Maine found time to make himself merry with our apprehensions and, amid much laughter and applause from his party friends on the floor and in the galleries, to prove how absurd it was to fear military power because, at present the Army was scattered over the broad face of the country, and was at present being used only for just and proper purposes. The answer of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE] sufficiently disposed of such fallacies.

I do not propose now or at any other time to stir the dying embers of past strife. I do not propose to recall any of those scenes enacted during a period of war, and which were to be accounted for only by the existence of war. I would gather from such memories only warnings to instruct but never to excite or inflame, and therefore I shall say nothing about the irregularities and lawlessness pending a condition of war, and which could not be expected to cease instantly after such violent convulsions. But, sir, it pleased the Senator from Maine to proclaim that there had been no presence of troops at the polls since the war, and he vauntingly challenged contradiction.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator will be good enough to state my words precisely if he intends to quote them?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Maine wishes to interrupt the Senator from Delaware he will address the Chair.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I address the Chair for that privilege.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Delaware yield?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the Senator quote my words accurately?

Mr. BAYARD. I should have to turn to the RECORD for the Senator's precise language——

Mr. BLAINE. Quote the substance accurately.

Mr. BAYARD. But the substance of it I do not doubt.

Mr. BLAINE. I call the attention of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] to what I said. He stated that day that I had made an absolute assertion. I said that in my judgment there was not a Senator on that side of the Chamber who had ever seen a United States soldier at the polls. That was my assertion.

Mr. BAYARD. If the Senator prefers to limit his statement to the actual vision of Senators on this floor, of course I have no objection. Far from me be it to misrepresent or misquote him; but I did consider that such was the substance of his statement; and I remember very well the confident manner in which he made proclamation of it.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, and the confidence of which has not in the least been disturbed by any response which has been made to it yet.

Mr. BAYARD. I accept the statement of the Senator in his own language. I have no time to get the RECORD, but if it is necessary I can do that, to find the exact words; but whether he said it or no, I take his statement now as being that which was made. I do not propose to refute his statement by reference to the Southern States, which are regarded still as objects of suspicion by himself and his party, but I will refer to the records of the action of General Grant's administration in that city of the North from which whole armies were recruited in defense of the Union, and which never was the theater of war at any time. In the New York Tribune of the 9th of November, 1870, will be found the following account of the proceedings of election in that city which took place the day previous:

> The military enjoyed a day of leisure. If they had not been stationed in force in the city no one can so much as imagine the fearful scenes there might have been enacted in our streets. But Tammany ruffians have never liked the smell of powder, and a wholesome fear of bullets and bayonets restrained them from their usual evil practices.
> To the colored men of the city all praise should be given. They voted almost unanimously the republican ticket, and many worked hard all day in bringing voters to the polls. The many colored marshals, about whom such an outcry has been made, performed their duties quietly, modestly, and at the same time with firmness and promptitude.

Then follow the official orders:

[Official.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, October 27, 1870.

SIR: In view of the apprehension that there may be possible opposition made to the United States laws in connection with the coming election in the city of New York, November 8, 1870, the President directs that you instruct Brigadier General McDowell, commanding the Department of the East, to hold the troops in that vicinity in readiness for service during a week, if necessary, to protect and assist the civil officers of the United States in their duty of enforcing the laws. The engineer troops and all others in the harbor of New York and vicinity will, for the occasion, be at his command. You will instruct General McDowell to confer fully beforehand with the United States marshal and the United States district attorney, to concert with them proper measures, and to promptly respond to any call made upon him for troops by the marshal during the week of the election, ordering them in such numbers and to such points in the city as the marshal may signify.

The President hopes that the use of the United States troops for the purpose indicated will never be required, but the law must be enforced, and he therefore expects General McDowell and the officers and troops under his command, while using the utmost discretion, to take care that the purpose of the Government to enforce the law is fully carried out; but in the performance of this duty they are only effectually to execute the measures indicated to them by the authorized civil officers of the United States.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.
CHAUNCEY McKEEVER,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

General W. T. SHERMAN,
United States Army, Washington, D. C.

[Special Orders No. 229.]

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE EAST,
New York City, November 5, 1870.

1. The available officers and two hundred non-commissioned officers and privates of the engineer troops at Willett's Point, New York Harbor, will come to the headquarters building in this city, on next Monday evening, November 7, so as to arrive by ten o'clock p. m., prepared for armed service, and to remain at least till Wednesday morning. They will come in a steamboat, which the quartermaster's department will send for them, and will be landed at the foot of Spring street, (Pier No. 43 North River,) and march thence and take the station which may be shown them by the district quartermaster. They will bring a day's cooked rations. Facilities will be afforded in the building for making hot coffee.

2. All the available officers and men of the Eighth Infantry will be brought to the city on Monday, the 7th instant, to arrive about ten o'clock p. m. They will come prepared for armed service, with their overcoats and blankets, to remain at least till Wednesday morning, the 9th instant. The colonel, with five companies, will take post in building No. 161 Avenue B, near the northeast corner of Tompkins square, and the lieutenant-colonel, with five companies, will take post in buildings Nos. 322, 324, and 326 East Forty-fifth street, between First and Second avenues.

3. The available officers and men of the companies of the First Artillery at Forts Hamilton, Wadsworth, and Wood, under Colonel Vogdes or the senior officer, will come to the city on Monday evening, the 7th instant, to arrive by about ten p. m., prepared for armed service, and to remain at least till Wednesday morning. They will take post in building No. 294 Broadway, near the corner of Reade street, and will land at the wharf most convenient for their reaching that point. They will bring with them a day's cooked rations and their camp-kettles for making coffee. The district quartermaster will furnish drays to carry their effects from the steamboat.

4. The troops above indicated, and the Fifth Artillery from Fort Trumbull and Fort Adams, are to be brought here to aid the United States civil officers in the execution of their duty in enforcing the United States laws; and it cannot be too strongly impressed on them that the duty they have to perform is one of exceeding delicacy and of the highest importance, and that it may depend largely on their fidelity and good conduct that peace is maintained. They will be held in readiness for service at literally a moment's notice; and from the time of their arrival not a man will be allowed to leave the building on any account, or for any purpose whatever, unless under a commissioned officer.

5. Commanders of the stations above named will, immediately on their arrival, send a report of the fact to department headquarters.

By command of Brigadier-General McDowell.

ROBERT C. PERRY,
Acting Assistant Adjutant-General.

The troops came on Monday night—

As they were ordered, says the same paper—and disembarked silently to their several quarters. During the day perfect order reigned. The headquarters of the department, at the corner of Houston and Greene streets, presented a quiet appearance. The stairways, however, leading to the two upper stories of the building were packed with troops. The engineer department from Willet's Point, numbering three hundred men, with Companies H and I of the Fifth United States Artillery from Fort Trumbull, New London, Connecticut, all under command of Colonel Kiddoe, were quartered in the halls and on the stairs. Their arms were stacked, and the men were scattered around on benches and on the floor, or stood in groups engaged in conversation. All were armed with the latest improved needle-gun and furnished with forty rounds of ammunition, with one hundred rounds a man in reserve.

At pier No. 27, North River, Companies A, B, and L, of the Fifth United States Artillery, from Fort Adams, Newport, were quartered on the steamer Metis. In addition to these was Dupont's Light Battery of four guns. None was allowed to leave the boat or to enter without a pass. The men were in the lower part of the boat and the officers were in the cabin, under Colonel Hunt.

Companies B, C, D, H, and M, of the First United States Artillery, Colonel Vogdes, from Forts Hamilton and Wadsworth, New York Harbor, were stationed in the three upper stories of No. 294 Broadway.

At No. 161 Avenue B, near Tompkins square, there were stationed the first five companies of the Eighth Infantry, Colonel Bomford in command. This regiment came from David's Island, and was armed with the needle-gun. They were quartered in the hall over a lager-beer saloon, and Company A was kept under arms ready for marching orders. The remaining five companies of the regiment were on Forty-fifth street, between First and Second avenues, in the large room of a brewery. Guards were, as in all cases, stationed at the top and bottom of the stairs, and all who applied for entrance were taken under guard before Colonel Edie. Long rows of stacked arms extended the whole length of the hall. An ample supply of ammunition was brought to the place, amounting in the aggregate to one hundred and forty rounds for each man.

And then it seems that the then Secretary of the Navy, Mr. ROBESON, lent his ready aid:

In the river and harbor, the frigates Guerriere and Narragansett were at anchor at the foot of Chambers street, North River, and Wall street, East River, respectively. The port-holes were all closed, however, and every appearance of warlike preparation on board was avoided. None other than the troops regularly stationed there were on Governor's Island.

Mr. BLAINE. I will not interrupt the Senator if it is in the least degree inconvenient to him, but I would be glad, with his permission, to ask him a question; not otherwise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Delaware yield?

Mr. BAYARD. If the Senator wishes to ask me any question on this point, of course I yield to him.

Mr. BLAINE. I was merely going to ask the Senator, when selecting a precedent nine or ten years ago, which I will not comment on now at length, if he could not have found one a little nearer the spot where he is speaking, where in a mere municipal election in 1857, with Mr. Buchanan as President, the marines of the United States were called out in this city and seven men shot down by them in the streets? It was a mere municipal election in which the Government of the United States had no interest at all. I should like the Senator to give his attention to that precedent, in which, as I say, the marines of the United States shot down seven citizens here in the public streets, within half a mile of where we are sitting.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the honorable Senator is the best guardian of his own reputation, but it seems to me that when he rose here and so positively scoffed at the explanations made to him of events much nearer the scene than twenty-odd years ago, he is not wise now to go back in American history to scenes more than twenty years old, while I am referring to the very date to which the Senator's observations on this floor a few days since applied.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

Mr. BAYARD. I shall not now discuss with the Senator the history of the occurrence of 1857; but I only will say that there is no event, no party, no man in the United States who sought to infringe the liberty of an American citizen who does not meet my condemnation now and will at all times.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. BAYARD. With pleasure.

Mr. BLAINE. In regard to the Senator's direction as to my wisdom of course I will take care of that myself. The Senator began the interruption which I made by palpably misquoting what I had said.

Mr. BAYARD. I accepted the Senator's correction.

Mr. BLAINE. Then the Senator comes back now and gives me monition as to my lack of wisdom in making an assertion which he had put in my mouth and which had no foundation whatever in fact. That is all to which I desire to call attention.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator does me injustice. His lack of wisdom I shall never attempt to supply.

Sir, I hold such military orders as I have just read and the employment of the armed forces of the United States then to have been simply atrocious. I believe they should consign the men who issued or approved them to the reprobation of a people who love their liberties.

Even during the war it never was pretended that the presence of armed forces at the election was anything else than a belligerent right to be exercised as a necessity growing out of the war. I hold in my hand the report of a gentleman of ability, a member of this body when I first entered it, whose legal learning was admitted by all parties, whose violence as a partisan was deplored by many. Mr. Howard, of Michigan, made a report on the 12th of February, 1864, being Report No. 14 of the Thirty-eighth Congress, first session. At that time complaint had been made of the gross abuse of military force in interfering with elections in many of the States. In my own State there had been complaint; and I had witnessed the complete occupation of the polls by the military of the United States. I had seen military order No. 54 issued by General Schenck, represented in the other Hall of Congress, and not the will of the people. I had myself deposited my ballot at polls where sentinels stood armed with guns which I and others had been taxed to purchase, in the attempted intimidation of the right of that people freely to vote according to their conscience and according to the Constitution and laws of the United States and of the State of Delaware. But as I said that was flagrante bello. It was on that occasion that Mr. Howard represented his party, and making a report concurred in by the entire Committee on Military Affairs spoke of the rightfulness of the exercise of this interference by the General Government at that time in bringing armed forces to the elections. First, he begins:

> That elections should be free from all violence and intimidation, is an axiom of free government accepted by all, and so evident that it need not be discussed. Violence and threats of violence, and all disturbance, actual or threatened, calculated to keep the legal voter from the polls or to constrain his free will and choice in exercising his right, are plainly incompatible with the principles on which our governments, whether State or Federal, rest. But it must at the same time be remembered that the purity of elections is equally essential to the proper working of that theory, and that to admit to the polls persons not possessing the requisite qualifications of age, citizenship, residence, &c., is by no means a less injury to the rights of the lawful elector than open violence.
> It is vain to deny that in the present struggle the Government of the United States is justly, and upon principles of public law, entitled to exercise toward their domestic enemies every belligerent right and power, every warlike appliance, recognized in the code of war; and that it is not only the right, but the duty of their officers and agents, in waging the contest, to exercise the utmost vigilance in detecting, restraining, and punishing the common enemy, and all who abet, sustain, or encourage him. To deny to it this right is to lay it prostrate and helpless at the feet of its deadly foes.
> Were the war a foreign war, waged with any independent nation, there could be no dispute as to the right of the Government to expel from the country every subject of the foreign power, and every person justly suspected of giving it aid and comfort, or to hold such parties in confinement till the war should terminate. This right is in the primary class of belligerent rights, pertaining to every independent nation; and no greater absurdity can be proposed than to say that, although the Federal Government is vested with all the powers known to the laws and usages of war, and may, unrestrained by any constitutional prohibition, use them against the subjects of a foreign government at war with the United States, yet, as to an organized, widespread insurrection of whole political communities within their own limits, acting under a de facto, though usurped government, it is stripped and denuded of this important means of annoyance and defense. It is plainly in its essence a military power—a belligerent right; as plainly such as the right of capture by sea, which has recently received the solemn sanction of the Supreme Court, in a judgment eminent for the power and clearness of its analysis, the profoundness of its learning, and the unanswerable character of its logic.

Further on, he says:

> And it is impossible to see any distinction in principle between such a case and the case of disloyal voters, who at the polls attempt by their ballots to do the same thing. In either case hostility to the Government and a desire for its overthrow stand as the sufficient reason for the preventive interference of the military arm. Not to use it on proper occasions is to expose to destruction the Government itself, and the liberties and rights it guards. It is the inalienable duty of self-defense.
> That this inherent right of war may be abused, as it possibly may have been occasionally during the present struggle, is certainly no reason for denying its existence, or, if it exist, for stripping our commanders of it by legislation; and the present time, when disloyalists swarm at every poll in large districts of country near the rebel lines, would seem to be most unpropitious for such innovation. The committee believe that no such restraint should be placed upon this tutelary authority of commanders at all; because, though liable to possible abuse, we are persuaded that the evil which might accidentally grow out of it would be, as it undoubtedly has been, as nothing, compared with the good that flows from its exercise.

This then is the language of that committee through its chairman, accepted and acted upon by the Congress under which the provision of the present law which is now proposed to be stricken out came into existence. There was no pretense that it was other than a belligerent right, to be exercised only during a period of war.

Such uses of the Army were never pretended to be justified excepting flagrante bello. It is to me simply amazing to hear gentlemen now gravely assert that the spirit of law and civil government can be found in such statutes as provide for holding popular elections in the presence of armed force. I do not desire at this time to address myself to this question on the ground that it is an invasion of the reserved and essential rights of the States by the Federal Government; I am not unmindful that this law and the contentions for power under, it are intended to take from the States and to transfer to the Government of the Union, the just and necessary control over their own elections.

It is not necessary for me now to consider that. I want to consider the question under the idea and doctrine that force unrestrained by law is fatal to freedom; and the issue before us is nothing less deep, nothing less clear, than that. It is force as against free will on which then the true strength of American government depends. Whether force or their free will shall control the people of the United States in their elections of members of Congress, the choice of their State legislators, or electors for President and Vice-President. The dangers of the centralization of all powers over these elections in the Federal Government I may discuss hereafter in connection with other measures that come before us.

My only object at this time is to warn this Senate and to warn the people of the United States against the doctrine of permitting, under the pretext of civil rule, the establishment of a military power that necessarily must become superior to it. If this law authorizing the President of the United States in his discretion to bring the Army of the United States to the polls of the several States, under pretext of keeping the peace—if such a law can be sustained, then will our elections necessarily become military forms merely, and the party that can obtain control of a government possessing such powers will inevitably possess the means for its own perpetuation, and the liberties of our people will rest only in a government of men and not of laws, in the conscience or degree of audacity or military capacity which any President and Administration can possess or control.

Mr. President, reverse the present political majorities. Suppose a republican House of Representatives—and a republican Senate—and a democrat in the presidential chair. I submit to the candor and the conscience of all fair men—would a solitary vote be given by our opponents in favor of placing such a provision on the statute-books—or of against its removal as is now proposed? I ask, would republican Senators ever consent that such a power should be vested in a democratic President? For their sakes and our own I trust they never would.

Amid the features of this debate which I have noticed with great regret, not, however, unmingled with surprise, have been the frequent and excited references by the Senators from Maine, Illinois, and Massachusetts to the fact that on the floor of this Chamber, and voting in its present majority, are a number of gentlemen who fifteen years ago bore arms against the Government of the United States in the late civil war. In the excited utterances of the Senators referred to, the presence of Senators from the Southern States in this body was held to constitute a just cause of alarm for the safety of our institutions, and the Senator from Illinois especially seemed quite unable to forgive himself for any share of magnanimity and leniency toward these "erring brethren." It is, however, my impression that it is not owing to the wishes of the republican party or its leaders that the present representation of the Southern States in this body is due. I cannot recall any speeches made at any time during the last ten years by any of the gentlemen who so mourn the presence of the ex-confederates upon this floor, that they have been found by their votes or counsel at all in accord with such results. I attribute the presence of the Senators whom I see around me from the Southern States to the logic of events: to the steady, irresistible pressure of the tide of wise and broad public sentiment, which rising throughout the country has compelled, for the sake of public welfare, a diminution and cessation of the violent practices approved and resorted to by the republican leaders to maintain power exclusively in their own hands.

It is to a wise, generous and magnanimous public sentiment that we owe the fact that seats on this floor are now filled by Senators from the Southern States who truly represent their people. I hail their presence here as a proof of the strength of my Government and not its weakness; a proof of public wisdom and not of folly—a reason for congratulation and not of fear.

Perhaps in this presence personal allusions should not be made; but they have been made, unkindly, disrespectfully, and unjustly to those whose sense of personal dignity has forbidden them to make reply—surely there can be no impeachment more gross than that of the good faith of a sworn officer to the performance of his duty, or of a citizen and a Senator in the honest support of his Government and its laws.

But will not the country, with a judgment more just than that of bitter partisanship, recognize the fact, which I believe no one will attempt to deny, that, among the gentlemen of the republican party on this floor, there is not one who, if he needed personal or professional counsel and aid in any matter involving the rights of person, property, or character, would not intrust all to the protection and care of any one of the Southern Senators upon the floor of this Senate; and if this be so, of their private lives, cannot it equally be said of their public lives? And is it not therefore unfair, disingenuous, and unjust, for party purposes to hold up an entire body of men as dangerous to the interests and the welfare of the country, when they are only to be regarded with esteem and confidence for their personal and private qualities?

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] told us in the outset of his address that he would not add to the present excitement if he was "able to possess himself," and he forthwith proceeded to prove that he was quite unequal to the task of self-repression.

If his speech was to be taken as representing the spirit of the people of the ancient and honorable Commonwealth from which he comes, I shall indeed feel apprehensive for the public peace and welfare, but I do not believe it can be. There have been other utterances I had rather cite, and now will do so in order that they may go forth in the same debate and "by the survival of the fittest" prove their relative worth.

On the one hundredth anniversary of the battle of Lexington, a celebration of that momentous event was held on the battle-ground. From all quarters of the country came Americans to pay honor to the memory of the brave men who stood sponsors for Liberty on that day of her bloody baptism. Among other invited guests was a soldier than whom—

> No worthier knight was found
> To grace in Arthur's golden age
> The fabled table round.

It was "William Francis Bartlett," of Massachusetts, who was asked to respond to the toast, "The North and the South," and although, as Colonel Palfrey, his biographer tells us, he "was chilled through and faint from want of food," he spoke as follows:

> When I opened the letter from your committee asking me to come from five hundred miles away and say a few words here to-day it seemed impossible. But as I read further your desire that I should speak on the "relations of the North to the South," and your assertion that, as an unprejudiced observer, what I might say would help to restore fraternal relations between the two great sections of our country, although knowing how greatly you overrated the value of any poor words of mine, I felt that if they could lend the least aid to the result you described, inclination and the cares of business must yield to the voice of duty, and I came. But, sir, I am not an "unprejudiced observer;" on the contrary, I have a prejudice, which is shared by all soldiers, in favor of peace. And I think I may safely say that between the soldiers of the two great sections of our country fraternal relations were established long ago. I have also a strong prejudice against any man or men who would divide or destroy or retard the prosperity and progress of the nation whose corner-stone was laid in the blood of our fathers one hundred years ago to-day. Moved by this prejudice, fourteen years ago I opposed the men who preferred disunion to death. True to this prejudice, I to-day despise the men who would, for the sake of self or party, stand in the way of reconciliation and a united country. The distinguished soldier who is your chief guest to-day never came nearer to the hearts of the people than when he said, "Let us have peace." And, sir, the only really belligerent people in the country to-day, North and South, are those who, while the war lasted, followed carefully the paths of peace. Do not believe that the light and dirty froth which is blown northward and scattered over the land (oftentimes for malicious purposes) represents the true current of public opinion at the South. Look to their heroes, their leaders—their Gordons, their Lees, their Johnsons, Lamar, Ransom, and Ripley—and tell me if you find in their utterances anything but renewed loyalty and devotion to a reunited country. These are the men, as our great and good Governor Andrew told you at the close of the war, these are the men by whom and through whom you must restore the South, instead of the meaner men for whom power is only a synonym for plunder. As I begged you last summer, I entreat you again: do not repel the returning love of these men by suspicion or indifference. If you cannot in forgiveness "kill the fatted calf," do not with coldness kill "the prodigal."

This speech rang through the country—and despite of narrow hatred and partisan bitterness its echoes will never cease. The lips of the noble speaker have closed in death, but the lesson of his life, his spirit, his example and the blessings of them to his countrymen will not die. His devotion and intrepidity won early for him rank and distinction and he engraved his name high on the shaft of fame—but his chief triumph and most enduring, was over the hearts and minds of those whom he had striven to conquer only to save.

In verses of singular force and beauty, a poet of his own native State, whose elevation of sentiment and purity of expression are unsurpassed by any living writer of our language, has given him a fitting epitaph—

> His fame who led the stormy van
> Of battle well may cease,
> But never that which crowns the man
> Whose victory was Peace.

Sir, one has not far to look in order to see why it is that these southern Senators are acting with the democratic majority on this floor. "Men do not gather grapes of thorns or figs of thistles." Nor do sympathy, good-will, and affiliation extend themselves toward a party that has never ceased to denounce them as unworthy of trust, unworthy of respect, obtaining their seats in Congress by mingled violence and fraud, and intending to use their power only for the subversion of the Government in whose service they have been sworn to act. I find it impossible to believe that the gentlemen of the republican party who complain of the "solid South" do not desire to make and keep it "solid," so that having succeeded in creating a sectional division of the country upon geographical lines, they may succeed in alarming the more numerous and powerful population of their own section in order to secure the continuance of their party predominance. In the face of the continued objurgations, assaults and threats, so constantly employed by the republican press and members of that party in both Houses of Congress, against the white population of the South, I cannot believe that they expect the South to remain otherwise than "solid," in its opposition to their plans, and such I am compelled to believe to be their deliberate intention. These are things for the people of this country gravely to consider, for I am well assured that a preponderance of one geographical section of the country, so obtained, will speedily lead to the depression and degradation of the other section, and to the ultimate ruin of both.

Why, sir; what is the object and intent of such language as was used by the Senator from Illinois the other day when, in the midst of very audible denunciation, he warned us in his most tragic tones, and with the aid of his elaborated manuscript, in such words as these:

> Let democrats of the South and their northern allies beware the storm they are raising. The spirit of retaliation once raised, sir, will only be appeased by the most radical assurances of future quiet. If the disease upon our body-politic again requires the knife, they may rest assured the surgeon will "cut beyond the wound to make the cure complete."

This simile may be termed one of surgery; to many it will be more suggestive of butchery. I do not propose to exchange warnings, much less threats, either with the Senator or his party; but to my fellow-countrymen I suggest that the knife, the use of which is to be restricted only "by the most radical assurances of future quiet," may indeed "cut beyond the wound" and reach the life of the patient.

Mr. President, the only just object of the late war between the Government of the United States and the Southern States was for a restoration of the Union on the basis of a constitutional government. The military methods that were resorted to for that restoration were intended to cease when it had become complete. The restoration of the Union was not intended to be accomplished at the cost of civil liberty in this country; nor was it intended that a military rule should be raised upon the ruins of civil government. I am convinced that methods of reason and justice and civil administration are those only which can restore to us the peace and prosperity, which are so essential for the continuance of our constitutional republican system. A departure from the methods of civil rule has led to consequences, which all thoughtful men recognize as putting a terrific strain upon the capacity of our people to maintain constitutional government.

To maintain our public credit in the face of an enormous indebtedness: to readjust our disordered finances; to reform our system of public revenues and taxation; to provide means for the distribution of our productions, mechanical and agricultural; to re-establish our carrying trade upon the high seas and give to us our just share of the benefits of the world's commerce and our rightful standing in influence and power in the great family of nations; all these call for the best energies, the most constant attention, and vigorous co-operation of all classes of our people, all political parties, and all sections and subdivisions in our country. These are the arts and the means of peace, these are the arts alone which can restore to us the security and confidence which are the essential conditions precedent to the prosperity so greatly desired.

If, as I trust, the period of reason has come and the era of excitement and revolution has passed, then I may hope that this calm and earnest plea for the cessation of military methods, and the restoration of civil rule alone among our countrymen may be heard and heeded. The opportunity, perhaps the natural inducement to make reply to the denunciations which have been bestowed upon the party represented by the majority in this Chamber, I have not been unmindful of, but believing as I do, that when the question we are now considering and on either side of which stand the two parties in this Chamber, is comprehended without the obscurations of party heat or denunciations, that the American people cannot and will not hesitate, in obedience to every tradition of their Government, to every teaching of history, to every sentiment of constitutional liberty, to agree, almost with one voice, that their elections shall be free, and shall not be held under the surveillance of armed forces, whether of the United States or of any State. To their deliberate judgment I submit the issue and await their decision with entire confidence.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, there is no contest over the pending bill (H. R. No. 1) for the support of the Army, except the sixth section. That section reads as follows:

SEC. 6. That section 2002 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States: Provided, That nothing contained in this section, as now amended, shall be held or deemed to abridge or affect the duty or power of the President of the United States, under section 5297 of the Revised Statutes, enacted under and to enable the United States to comply with section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States, on application of the Legislature or executive, as provided for in said section."

And that section 5528 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"Every officer of the Army or Navy, or other person in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, who orders, brings, keeps, or has under his authority or control any troops or armed men at any place where a general or special election is held in any State, unless such force be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States, shall be fined not more than $5,000, and suffer imprisonment at hard labor not less than three months nor more than five years."

Section 2002, Revised Statutes, which this section is designed to replace, reads as follows:

No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control, any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States, or to keep the peace at the polls.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] proposes the following amendment to section 6 of the pending bill, and this proposed amendment is the pending question, namely:

And any military, naval, or civil officer, or any other person, who shall, except for the purposes herein named, appear armed with a deadly weapon of any description, either concealed or displayed, within a mile of any polling place where a general or special election for Representative to Congress is being held, shall, on conviction, be punished with a fine not less than five hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or with imprisonment for a period not less than six months nor more than five years, or with both fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court.

Before proceeding to the main issue, I shall devote a few words to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine. It assumes that Congress possesses the constitutional power to punish by fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court, the wearing of arms within a mile of any voting place for Representatives to Congress at any general or special election. Nothing in the course of this discussion has surprised me so much as the assumption that Congress has the constitutional power to pass this amendment, for I assume, of course, that the amendment is proposed in good faith.

The second amendment to the Constitution reads as follows:

A well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

This is not an inhibition upon the States, or in any wise a right granted the people, for the rights of the people to keep and bear arms were possessed before the adoption of the Constitution; it is an absolute prohibition upon the Federal Government to interfere in any wise whatever with the inalienable, unparted-with right of the people to keep and bear arms in any way or manner whatever that they may see proper.

Speaking of the second amendment, of the right to keep and "bear arms," which "shall not be infringed," the Supreme Court, in United States vs. Cruikshank et al., 2 Otto, on page 553, says:

This is not a right granted by the Constitution. Neither is it in any manner dependent upon that instrument for its existence. The second amendment declares that it shall not be infringed; but this, as has been seen, means no more than that it "shall not be infringed by Congress." This is one of the amendments that has no other effect than to restrict the powers of the National Government, leaving the people to look for their protection against any violation by their fellow-citizens of the rights it recognizes, to what is called in The City of New York vs. Miln, 11 Pet., 139, the "powers which relate to merely municipal legislation, or what was perhaps more properly called internal police," "not surrendered or restrained" by the Constitution of the United States.

The sole and exclusive power of regulating the manner of bearing arms, and of prohibiting their being borne in particular places, is in the States—a police power in the States—and is "neither surrendered nor restrained" by the Constitution of the United States. It follows that the object sought by the amendment of the Senator from Maine is not within the constitutional power of Congress, as is not only manifest by the second amendment but by the decision of the Supreme Court before cited, and I leave that amendment of the Senator from Maine to be met and answered by the second amendment to the Constitution, and by the utterance of the Supreme Court, that "it"—the right to keep and bear arms—"shall not be infringed by Congress," and its further utterance that the only effect of that amendment is "to restrict the powers of the National Government." The second amendment leaves the people to look for protection to their own State governments, in the exercise of their well-known police powers, and these powers they do exercise, in some of the States at least, not only in the prohibition to carry concealed weapons at public gatherings including elections; but in some States, as in Texas, it is made a penal offense by State laws to carry concealed weapons at all.

This is all I care to say in reply to the proposed amendment of the Senator from Maine, except that the Senator from Maine in effect, by his amendment, concedes the vice in section 2002 of authorizing troops to be used to keep the peace at the polls at any general or special election in any State by restricting the offense and penalty to elections for Representatives to Congress. If section 2002 is good law, why did not the Senator apply his amendment to any general or special election in any State according to that section? I now pass to the real question at issue: a free ballot, unawed, uninfluenced, uncontrolled by armed soldiers in the uniform and under the pay of the Government of the United States—yes or no. That is the question, and the vital question we are to consider and vote upon. This issue is squarely presented by the democratic party in the sixth section of the pending bill, which is simply an amendment of section 2002 Revised Statutes, the amendment consisting in striking out the words in the last line of the section, namely, "or to keep the peace at the polls." Can the military power of the United States be constitutionally and lawfully employed to keep the peace at the polls? Section 2002, although negative in form, assumes affirmatively the right of the United States to authorize and direct their military and naval officers to order, bring, keep, and have under their authority and control troops and armed men at the place where any election, general or special, is held in any State in the following cases:

First. Where it may be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States.

Second. To keep the peace at the polls.

The first proposition is conceded, and is the sixth section of the pending bill, the proviso in that section being explanatory only, and inserted to prevent the section being construed as in any wise affecting section 5297, Revised Statutes. That section is as follows:

In case of an insurrection in any State, against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the executive, when the Legislature cannot be convened, to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States, which may be applied for, as he deems sufficient to suppress such insurrection; or, on like application, to employ, for the same purposes, such part of the land or naval forces of the United States as he deems necessary.

(See act February 28, 1795, vol. 1, p. 424, and act March 3, 1807, vol. 2, p. 443, Rev. St., 2d ed., p. 1029.) And these acts, embraced in section 5297, were passed to carry into effect section 4, article 4, of the Constitution. About section 6, then, of the pending bill there is no dispute. It is conceded on all sides that it is both constitutional and expedient.

Why, then, declare as has been done over and over again by republican speakers that it is coercion, revolution? The Senator from Maine boasts that it is the work of a republican Congress. Why object to it? Surely the bill contains nothing objectionable. They concede that. What, then, is the cause of all this commotion? It is that this bill, while inserting in section 6 all of section 2002 of the Revised Statutes that it ought to contain, strikes down and out those eight little words, "or to keep the peace at the polls." And never in all history did the friends of liberty do a manlier act, one more conducive to the restoration of constitutional free government, one more in harmony with the inalienable rights of the people and the genius of free government. It is the assertion of free ballot against armed Federal power. And in a great measure like this the method—if it be but constitutional, as the method proposed is beyond cavil—sinks into utter insignificance compared with the object to be accomplished.

Those eight little words, "or to keep the peace at the polls," have aroused all this assumed wrath which has fretted the ears of the public for weeks past; all this cry of revolution, all this denunciation of the South specially, and of the democratic party generally. One would suppose that the fate of free government rested on the divine right of armed Federal soldiers to control the ballots of freemen exercising their inestimable birthright under the laws of their States. Upon what grant in the Constitution does this power of the Federal Government "to keep the peace at the polls" by an armed force rest? Point it out; name it; locate it; give us the article and section of the Constitution relied upon to support this assumed power, and which does support it. It has not been done, nor in my judgment can be.

The Senator from Maine says:

I beg you to observe, Mr. President, that this is the first instance in the legislation of the United States in which any restrictive clause whatever was put upon the statute-book in regard to the use of troops at the polls. The republican party did it with the Senate and the House in their control. Abraham Lincoln signed it when he was Commander-in-Chief of an army larger than ever Napoleon Bonaparte had at his command. So much by way of correcting an ingenious and studied attempt at misrepresentation.

That is perfectly true; and let me tell the Senator that until the republican party acceded to power it was never conceived in the imagination of man that the day would dawn on this country that any administration would need to be restrained by such an act. It was passed, it is true, when the republican party had control of both Houses; but save and except the eight little words, "or to keep the peace at the polls," it was demanded by the democratic party, and introduced by a democrat, and the honest, liberty-loving people of all parties would have resisted with righteous indignation the refusal to pass it. But those eight little words, "or to keep the peace at the polls," were not asked by democrats, but protested against by them. They were the offspring of Mr. Pomeroy, of Kansas, a bright and shining light of the republican party, a republican of republicans, and democrats were forced to take this wonderful gift in order to secure what they asked, which is just what is now in the bill. I think I should have suspected the concealed freight of this Grecian horse. At all events, I think the warning of Virgil, "Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes," worthy of consideration in respect to political gifts from the republican party. It is true that nothing in the conduct of any administration prior to that time gave occasion to such a statute. It is said that a citizen of a nation in ancient times, which had no law against parricide, was asked by a stranger the cause of what seemed to him such singular and extraordinary omission, and was answered: It is impossible for our people to conceive that such a crime could be committed. Before the advent of the republican party this crime of military interference with free elections was not conceived of.

But I again ask, where is the power lodged in the Constitution, authorizing the Federal Government to keep the peace at the polls? If there is no such grant in the Constitution, the power does not exist. The tenth amendment to the Constitution reads:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

The Supreme Court in the Cruikshank case, already cited, 2 Otto, 551, says:

> The Government of the United States is one of delegated powers alone. Its authority is defined and limited by the Constitution. All powers not granted to it by that instrument are reserved to the States or the people. No rights can be acquired under the Constitution or laws of the United States, except such as the Government of the United States has the authority to grant or secure. All that cannot be so granted or secured are left under the protection of the States.

If, then, the grant to the Federal Government to keep the peace at the polls is not to be found in the Constitution it has no such power. Is it in the thirteenth, fourteenth, or fifteenth amendment? In United States vs. Reese, 2 Otto, 217, the Supreme Court says:

> The fifteenth amendment does not confer the right of suffrage upon any one.

In Minor vs. Happersett, 21 Wall., 178, last paragraph, the court says:

> The Constitution of the United States does not confer the right of suffrage upon any one.

On page 170 of the same opinion the court says:

> The United States has no voters in the States of its own creation. The elective officers of the United States are all elected directly or indirectly by State voters. The members of the House of Representatives are to be chosen by the people of the States, and the electors in each State must have the qualifications requsite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

This opinion was rendered in October, 1874, long after the adoption of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments, and declares emphatically that "the United States has no voters in the States of its own creation." I might rest as to voters here, upon the point, that, as the United States have no voters in the States, that as all elective officers, including Representatives in Congress, are elected by State voters, the protection of these voters, and control of elections, are, in the very nature of things, and necessarily, exclusively under the control of the States, and therefore any law of Congress which seeks to interfere with elections in the States is unconstitutional, null, and void; and that portion of section 2002 of the Revised Statutes which authorizes the use of Federal troops to keep the peace at the polls, being without grant of authority in the Constitution, and repugnant to the reserved rights of the States, and in conflict with the duty, right, and power of the States to keep the peace and protect their voters by their own police regulations, is unconstitutional, null, and void, and it is the bounden duty of Congress to remove it from the statute-books; and it is not of the slightest consequence whether this is done by separate bill, or on an appropriation bill, or on any other bill.

And right here I beg to call the attention of the Senate specially to section 2002 of the Revised Statutes before quoted, and repealed by section 6 of the pending bill, and an examination will show that the use of troops as therein authorized is not limited to elections of presidential electors and Representatives in Congress, but authorizes the use of troops "to keep the peace at the polls" "at the place where any general or special election is held in any State," and thus elections for purely State officers are, under that section, just as much subject to armed interference as those for presidential electors and Representatives in Congress, a palpable infraction of State jurisdiction and control in matters of purely State concern. And it is well to bear in mind that if this power to interfere by placing armed troops under Federal authority to keep the peace at the polls, "at the place where any general or special election is held in any State," exists, whether the elections concern the electors for President and Vice-President, Representatives in Congress, or State officials, then the same power could be exercised by surrounding State capitals with Federal troops "to keep the peace at the polls" whenever an election for Senators to this body was to take place, for there is precisely as much authority under the Constitution to regulate, influence, or in any manner interfere with the manner of holding elections of Senators by the presence of armed troops, as of the manner of holding elections for electors, Representatives, or State officers. The doctrine is alarming. It enables the party in power, if unscrupulous, to dominate all elections. It subordinates the civil to the military power, and violates rudely the very genius of our institutions. It will not do to say that such a power will never be exercised. The sad history of the driving out by armed military power the Legislature of Louisiana, and the notorious military outrage of the Legislature of South Carolina, are more fresh in memory than the outrages of Pride and Cromwell in the House of Commons, and the derisive "take away the bauble" of Cromwell may be repeated in the legislative halls of some State in the land consecrated by our ancestors to be the home of freedom and civil liberty forever.

I beg now to direct the attention of the Senate to another point in this important inquiry. The right of the people peaceably to assemble themselves together for any lawful purpose whatever existed long before the Constitution was adopted. The right to assemble together for the purpose of voting is lawful, and an assemblage for that purpose is a lawful assemblage. It is a lawful assemblage of the people as citizens, not of the United States, but as citizens of the State, and to exercise their rights as voters, not of the United States, but of the State; for bear in mind, Mr. President, I have shown by the decision of the highest judicial tribunal known to this land that first, "the United States has no voters in the States of its own creation;" second, the elective officers of the United States are all elected directly or indirectly by State voters.

It follows, then, as surely as "grass grows and water runs," that under our Constitution the entire control of elections must be under the States whose voters assemble; whose right to vote is not drawn from the Constitution of the United States, but existed and was freely exercised long before its adoption; whose right to assemble existed and was freely exercised long before the adoption of the Constitution. Now, the right to assemble and the right to vote, existing before the adoption of the Constitution and never having been parted with, delegated, or granted, are reserved by the very terms of the Constitution, tenth amendment, "to the people," and the duty as well as power of protecting the people in their right to assemble and in their right to vote having been lodged in the States at and prior to the adoption of the Constitution, and never having been parted with, delegated, or granted, are by the very terms of the same amendment "reserved to the States respectively," and having been so reserved in the case of the right of the people to assemble and vote and in the case of the duty, right, and power of the States respectively to protect them, there is, by the most beneficent provisions of our matchless form of government, no room for the bayonet to pierce these sacred and inestimable rights and duties of the people and of the States.

And in support of this position in respect to assemblage and protection I again refer to the Cruikshank case, 551 to 555, inclusive, as follows:

> The right of the people peaceably to assemble for lawful purposes existed long before the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. In fact, it is and always has been one of the attributes of citizenship under a free government. It "derives its source," to use the language of Chief-Justice Marshall in Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 211, "from those laws whose authority is acknowledged by civilized man throughout the world." It is found wherever civilization exists. It was not, therefore, a right granted to the people by the Constitution. The Government of the United States when established found it in existence, with the obligation on the part of the States to afford it protection. As no direct power over it was granted to Congress it remains, according to the ruling in Gibbons vs. Ogden, id., 203, subject to State jurisdiction. Only such existing rights were committed by the people to the protection of Congress as came within the general scope of the authority granted to the National Government.
> The first amendment to the Constitution prohibits Congress from abridging "the right of the people to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." This, like the other amendments proposed and adopted at the same time, was not intended to limit the powers of the State governments in respect to their own citizens, but to operate upon the National Government alone. Barron vs. City of Balt., 7 Pet., 250; Lessees of Livingston vs. Moore, id., 551; Fox vs. Ohio, 5 How., 434; Smith vs. Maryland, 18 id., 76; Withers vs. Bockley, 20 id., 90; Persear vs. The Commonwealth, 5 Wall., 479; Twitchell vs. The Commonwealth, 7 id., 321; Edwards vs. Elliott, 21 id., 557.
> It is now too late to question the correctness of this construction. As was said by the late Chief-Justice in Twitchell vs. Commonwealth, 7 Wall., 325, "the scope and application of these amendments are no longer subjects of discussion here."
> They left the authority of the States just where they found it, and added nothing to the already existing powers of the United States. The right was not created by the amendment; neither was its continuance guaranteed, except as against congressional interference. For their protection in its enjoyment, therefore, the people must look to the States. The power for that purpose was originally placed there, and it has never been surrendered to the United States. The very highest duty of the States, when they entered into the Union under the Constitution, was to protect all persons within their boundaries in the enjoyment of those "inalienable rights with which they were endowed by their Creator." Sovereignty for this purpose rests alone with the States.

I respectfully submit, first, that the right of assemblage of the people is vested, and was so before the adoption of the Constitution; second, that the duty and exclusive power of protection of such assemblages, including assemblages at the place of voting, are in the States, and that the highest duty of the States is to afford such protection, and such protection is exclusively within State jurisdiction, the power having been orignally placed in the States and not parted with; third, the United States have no constitutional power to interfere with the duties and powers of the States or rights of the people in this regard.

And it follows, it seems to me, inevitably that the power to keep the peace at the polls, as well as in all other assemblages of the people, being exclusively in the States, the clause repealed by the sixth section of the amendment is properly, lawfully, and constitutionally stricken out.

No one, so far as I know or have heard, pretends to lodge this power in the fourth section, fourth article of the Constitution. That article guarantees to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and every State has such form of government. It obliges the United States to protect each of the States against invasion, and invasion has nothing to do with keeping the peace at the polls; and, lastly, on application of the Legislature, or of the executive when the Legislature cannot be convened, against domestic violence. Section 2002 draws no inspiration from that clause, for it does not so much as say "by your leave" let alone "by your invitation" to either Legislature or executive. I have heard it intimated that the power might be lodged in clause 1, section 4, article 1, Constitution, namely:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

The only possible word out of which a vivid imagination could raise the semblance of an argument in the above clause is in the word "manner." The very limited debate on this clause in the convention is sufficient to show that the point sought to be guarded against was not the people at the polls, and was not the fear of a breach of the peace at the polls. Mr. Madison (page 1280, volume 3, The Madison Papers) expressed concern as to the course Legislatures might take. He speaks of the abuses that might be made by the Legislatures if the power were exclusively in them of regulating the times, places, and manner of holding elections, and says "these words are of great latitude;" that "it was impossible to foresee all the abuses that might be made of this discretionary power" that is in the Legislatures; that "the State Legislatures 'might' sometimes fail or refuse to consult the common interest at the expense of their local convenience or prejudices."

The following extract from the remarks of Mr. Madison in the debate contains a brief summary of his reasons for wishing Congress to have the power to make or alter such regulations as to the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives as the Legislatures may have prescribed, namely:

Whether the electors should vote by ballot or viva voce; should assemble at this place or that place; should be divided into districts, or all meet at one place; should all vote for all the Representatives, or all in a district vote for a number allotted to the district—these and many other points would depend on the Legislatures, and might materially affect the appointments. Whenever the State Legislacures had a favorite measure to carry, they would take care so to mold their regulations as to favor the candidates they wished to succeed.—(Ib., p. 1280, 1281.)

Now, it will be noted that Mr. Madison's batteries are directed against the Legislatures; the bayonets under section 2002 are directed against the people. Mr. Madison expresses no fear of the people. Section 2002 implies fear of the people. Mr. Madison expresses fear of the Legislatures. Section 2002 neither expresses nor implies fear of them. It is perfectly manifest, I submit, that the use of troops was not contemplated in connection with that clause of the Constitution.

In support of this power in the Federal Government to keep the peace at the polls, much stress has been laid upon an expression of Mr. Alexander Hamilton in the fifty-ninth number of the Federalist, concerning the regulation of elections. Discussing in that number the first clause of section 4, article 1, of the Constitution, which declares that—

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators,

Mr. Hamilton says:

Its propriety rests upon the evidence of this plain proposition, that every government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation.

There is nothing whatever in conflict with this expression and the reasons which I have before cited, of Mr. Madison in the convention that framed the Constitution, in support of the power of alteration in Congress.

"The means of its own preservation" in that clause consist in the control which Congress may exercise over the Legislatures, and those means are plainly stated on the face of the clause in question to be that Congress may alter—

First, the times of holding elections for Senators and Representatives.

Second, the places of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, (except as to the places of choosing Senators.)

Third, the manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives.

All three of these points were discussed by Mr. Madison in the convention, and wholly and legitimately, in respect to the control of the Legislature over them, and the necessity, in his judgment, of the check given by that clause to Congress over the Legislature. Not a word was said in that debate of a check over the people, nor a reference to an armed force, nor was anything said in that convention by Mr. Hamilton in that or any other number of the Federalist of a check over the people, or in respect to keeping the peace at the polls with an armed force.

And Mr. Hamilton's proposition, "that every government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation," if it has any application to the matter in issue, proves too much for those who introduce it. If the United States Government "ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation," "each State government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation." This is impossible when upon any reason the control of its elections are taken from it. The existence of the State rests upon the consent of the governed, freely expressed through the ballot-box, and when it is or may be deprived of the power of protecting its people in the freedom of ballot, it does not contain in itself the means of its own preservation. The argument is a boomerang. Mr. Hamilton's proposition cannot be twisted or distorted into a support of the doctrine that the Federal Government may interfere by armed force with elections under any guise or pretext whatever.

The question before the convention of 1787 was, Should Congress have any check over the Legislatures in these regards? Mr. Madison thought yes. Mr. Pinckney and Mr. Rutledge thought no. A single remark of Mr. Sherman, to be found on page 1282, 3 Madison Papers, in the course of that debate, discloses precisely the point in the minds of the convention, namely:

Mr. Sherman did not know but it might be best to retain the clause, though he had himself sufficient confidence in the State Legislatures.

Were there no light shed by the debates on this clause, sound reason, it seems to me, would construe it without doubt or difficulty. The question respected the times, places, and manner of holding elections. A breach of the peace is not an element in either time, place, or manner of holding elections. The law provides lawful methods of holding elections, and then, not in some occult way, not under a bushel, provides against their infraction, and appropriate penalties therefor.

Great as Mr. Hamilton undoubtedly was, and patriot as no one doubts, it is painfully true that Mr. Hamilton had not that high respect for the average intelligence of the people, for their capacity for self-government, that most of his compatriots entertained; but Mr. Hamilton would never have shocked the sensibilities of the American people, jealous of their rights, by a proposition that under any contingency Federal soldiers could have been marched to the polls and kept there during the election under the flimsy guise of keeping the peace.

The student of constitutional history has not failed to mark the jealousy with which our ancestors regarded a standing army. Had such a construction been put on the Constitution before its adoption as is now contended for it never would have been adopted. And it is noteworthy that this privilege to Congress was never exercised for eighty years after the adoption of the Constitution; and when exercised, the time was established throughout the States and Territories of holding elections for Representatives and Delegates. The places were established to be districts, composed of contiguous territory, as near as practicable of an equal number of inhabitants. The manner of holding elections was established to be by ballot, and all votes received or recorded other than written or printed ballots should be of no effect. Congress, I submit, exhausted its power, and justly construed its full power under clause 1, section 4, article 1, in sections 23 to 27, inclusive, of the Revised Statutes; so that we have the natural meaning of the clause, the construction put on it pending its discussion and before its adoption, and the construction put on it by Congress when it came to act upon it, and these all concur. So I conclude that it is impossible to draw the power from this clause, and I have endeavored to show that it cannot be drawn from any other clause, section, article, or sentence of the Constitution, expressly or by necessary implication. Besides, the section 2002 does not require the troops to be moved upon the ground in the event of a breach of the peace, but are put there nominally to keep the peace, and may be moved there even before the polls are opened. The presumption of law is that every man knows the law and will obey it. This section proceeds upon the theory that the people will disobey the law, and therefore need restraint.

The Army in my judgment was not designed for any such purpose; nor do I doubt that such duties are exceedingly distasteful. The legitimate duties of the Army in this country in time of peace are the protection of the public property intrusted to their charge and the protection of our thin settlements along our extended frontier. It is a branch of public service in its nature subordinate to the civil authorities; it has no wish to be otherwise employed than in its legitimate duties, and the very genius of our institutions forbids its use as an armed police power at the polls. The people have always been jealous of military interference with their rights, an interference in no wise tolerated by the laws of the country from which we sprang, and which were well known to the framers of the Constitution whose jealousy of a standing army is distinctly marked in the proceedings of the convention that framed the Constitution, as well as in the debates in the convention of the States which ratified it, and I submit that the political history of our country is against the claim of the United States to interfere with the people at the polls, in either Federal or State elections.

I now pass to another position to which the Senator from Maine devoted some attention. It was insisted that because of the very small number of troops in the States east of Omaha, as he expressed, or correctly, perhaps, east of the frontier line, the repeal was not a matter of such importance in any event as to be placed upon an appropriation bill. I might reply that if it were of little consequence, opposition to its repeal need not be so persistent.

Its repeal is not regarded by the party with which I act as trifling or inconsequential. I believe that every violation of the Constitution should be zealously resisted, and when convinced that the Constitution has been violated that it is our bounden duty to retrace our steps and return to the ancient "landmark." Every violation of the Constitution is dangerous. Every statute left upon the statute-book violative of the Constitution is a false teacher, educating the people in false doctrine. No doctrine can be more false or pernicious than interference with the free exercise of the right of suffrage. The position that the evil complained of is not great in proportions or exigent, and therefore need not be remedied, is not new. Daniel Webster, whose giant intellect shed light upon every subject he touched, made known to the Senate his views as to the necessity of guarding against every encroachment upon the rights of the people, however small that encroachment might be. See his speech, May 7, 1834, on the presidential protest, to be found in volume 4 of his works, beginning on page 103. I extract from that speech what may be found on pages 109 and 110, as follows:

Every encroachment, great or small, is important enough to awaken the attention of those who are intrusted with the preservation of a constitutional government. We are not to wait till great public mischiefs come, till the Government is overthrown, or liberty itself put into extreme jeopardy. We should not be worthy sons of our fathers were we so to regard great questions affecting the general freedom. Those fathers accomplished the Revolution on a strict question of principle. The Parliament of Great Britain asserted a right to tax the colonies in all cases whatsoever; and it was precisely on this question that they made the Revolution turn. The amount of taxation was trifling, but the claim itself was inconsistent with liberty, and that was in their eyes enough.

This claim is inconsistent with liberty, and that in democratic eyes is enough.

It was against the recital of an act of Parliament, rather than against any suffering under its enactments, that they took up arms. They went to war against a preamble. They fought seven years against a declaration. They poured out their treasures and blood like water, in a contest against an assertion which those less sagacious and not so well schooled in the principles of civil liberty would have regarded as barren phraseology or mere parade of words. They saw in the claim of the British Parliament a seminal principle of mischief, the germ of unjust power; they detected it, dragged it forth from underneath its plausible disguises, struck at it; nor did it elude either their steady eye or their well-directed blow till they had extirpated and destroyed it, to the smallest fiber. On this question of principle, while actual suffering was yet afar off, they raised their flag against a power to which, for purposes of foreign conquest and subjugation, Rome, in the height of her glory, is not to be compared; a power which has dotted over the surface of the whole globe with her possessions and military posts, whose morning drum-beat, following the sun and keeping company with the hours, circles the earth with one continuous and unbroken strain of the martial airs of England.

The necessity of holding strictly to the principle upon which free governments are constructed, and to those precise lines which fix the partitions of power between different branches, is as plain, if not as cogent, as that of resisting, as our fathers did, the strides of the parent country against the rights of the colonies; because, whether the power which exceeds its just limits be foreign or domestic, whether it be the encroachment of all branches on the rights of the people, or that of one branch on the rights of others, in either case the balanced and well-adjusted machinery of free government is disturbed, and, if the derangement go on, the whole system must fall.

I have not found anywhere a passage more worthy to be placed before the American people on the question before the Senate. I trust that the positions of the two parties on this question will be calmly and dispassionately and with the dignity becoming the issue laid before the people. If the democratic party are to be condemned for their earnest desire and earnest effort to secure to the people beyond peradventure or contingency the free ballot, so be it.

Free government rests upon it, cannot exist without it, and will inevitably go down if this grand conservator is destroyed. The pride and boast of our people is that their government is "of the people, by the people, for the people, and shall not perish from the earth;" that through the ballot the people's will is effectively spoken. It is

A weapon that comes down as still
As snow-flakes fall upon the sod;
But executes a freeman's will,
As lightning does the will of God.

It is to preserve the ballot in its purity that we seek the repeal of a law which we believe is calculated to despoil its purity.

Whether or not troops have been kept at the polls since the war was over, and since courts, Federal and State, were opened is a question of fact, and I presume the memory of thousands of living witnesses will settle it. The Senator from Maine complains that of the forty-two democrats in the Senate "thirty are from the South, twenty-three, a positive and pronounced majority, having themselves been participants in the war against the Union, either in military or civil station." The Senator will find, I think, these thirty southern democrats as attentive to their duties, as careful of the public interests, as decorous in intercourse with their brother Senators as any like number of Senators from any other parts of the Union on this floor.

Their crime consists in their inability to see with others' eyes, and in possessing the inborn self-respect to favor their convictions of right regardless of whom they may please or displease. By the Constitution and laws of the land they are eligible to seats on this floor, and having been honored by their States with the positions they hold the Senator from Maine may rest perfectly assured that they will assert and maintain the equality of their States with any other States, and themselves as the equals in right and in honor and the offices of courtesy with the Senators from the other States of the Union. Claiming no superiority, they recognize none in others. They do not attempt to stir up the fast failing embers of the past, because they believe that every interest of the whole country demands conciliation, reconciliation, and restoration of a genuine spirit of brotherhood among a people having a common flag and a common destiny. In my judgment he is a cruel, cold man who could—

Lift, unflinching, the pall
From the bier of the dead past.

The Senator from Maine made allusion to the martyred President calculated to cause his devoted admirers to condemn those who support the proposed legislation, because he connects Mr. Lincoln's name with the legislation sought to be repealed. While all accord to Mr. Lincoln independence of thought and fearlessness of action, no man was more ready than he to accord to others the same right he claimed for himself. His last inaugural address contains a sentiment that all good men the world over indorse—"With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right." Our people were firm in the right as God gave us to see the right, and we accord to the people of the North the same honesty, the same fearlessness in the right as God gave them to see it. No more, no less.

Strife and contention over the dead past do no good and much harm. So believing, I avoid part and lot in it. I would rather aid in rebuilding our shattered commerce, in securing additional profitable outlets for our surplus productions, in securing the great prize of Mexican and South American trade, in setting in successful motion the plow, the loom, and the anvil. I believe "that whoever could make two ears of corn or two blades of grass to grow upon a spot of ground where only one grew before would deserve better of mankind and do more essential service to his country than the whole race of politicians put together;" certainly than the whole race of political barrators and common scolds, whose highest idea of statesmanship is to find fault with somebody and to stir up strife, and go in on the upheaval.

Mr. President, the question at issue is a simple one, in which there is no legitimate room for stirring up bad blood. The effect, if not the purpose, will be easily discerned by an intelligent people. I have presented my views dispassionately and as I think with perfect fairness. I believe the argument sound, and if it is there can be no question as to the constitutionality and expediency of the proposed legislation. The majority of the Senate will be held responsible by the people for the action of this body; they go before the country giving the reasons for the faith that is in them, and, in the language of Mr. Webster, "the Senate must stand on its rendered reasons."

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WITHERS. Will the Senator withdraw that motion a moment in order that we may see whether any other Senator desires to continue the discussion to-day?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. WITHERS. It is an early hour.

Mr. ALLISON. If any other Senator desires the floor to-day, I will withdraw my motion for that purpose.

Mr. WITHERS. It is only a few minutes after three o'clock, and as I last week gave notice that I would ask to have a vote on the bill by the middle of this week, I am desirous that every Senator who wishes should have an opportunity of participating in the debate before that time. If no Senator takes the floor, I shall yield to the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. I will yield to any Senator who may desire to speak to-day.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask the Senator to withdraw his motion for a moment, that I may present some papers and have them referred to a committee.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw the motion for morning business.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PENDLETON presented additional papers relating to the application of Crafts J. Wright, late colonel of the Thirteenth Missouri Volunteers, to be allowed a pension; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 464) for the erection of a public building at Montgomery, Alabama; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. WITHERS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 465) granting an increase of pension to George Smith; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McDONALD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 466) for the relief of George McDougall; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VOORHEES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 467) to carry into effect the second and sixteenth articles of the treaty between the United States and the Great and Little Osage Indians proclaimed January 21, 1867; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BAILEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 468) for the relief of John W. Cheeks; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 469) for the relief of the City Distilling Company of Pekin, Illinois; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALLISON. I now renew my motion for an executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business?

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at three o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 21, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. GILBERT DE LA MATYR.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twenty-one minutes past twelve o'clock. This being Monday, the first business in order is the call of States and Territories, commencing with the State of Maine, for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to appropriate committees, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider. Under this call joint resolutions and memorials of State and territorial Legislatures are in order.

Mr. HASKELL. I ask unanimous consent that the call of States and Territories be continued until the list is gone through.

Mr. STEPHENS. I hope that will be granted.

Mr. FINLEY. I object for the present. It will be time enough to make that motion when we see how nearly we are through at the termination of the hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kansas at the end of the morning hour to move to suspend the rules for the purpose he has indicated.

Mr. FINLEY. I withdraw the objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. HASKELL.]

Mr. HUNTON. I rise to mention the fact that to-day is the day set apart under the rules for business of the District of Columbia; and I propose at two o'clock to ask unanimous consent that next Monday at two o'clock be set apart for District business instead of to-day.

There was no objection, and the order was made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] has withdrawn his objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] that the call of States and Territories be continued until the list is gone through. The Chair hears no further objection, and it is so ordered.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WILSON. I rise to a personal explanation. When I left here last Saturday week I gave to the Speaker's messenger a written memorandum, asking that leave of absence be granted to me on account of serious sickness in my family. I do not find, by reference to the RECORD, that the leave was granted.

Mr. CARLISLE. I will state to the gentleman that the leave was granted on one occasion when I was occupying the chair myself as Speaker pro tempore, and it is so announced in the RECORD.

COINAGE OF GOLD AND SILVER.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twenty-five minutes past twelve o'clock. There comes over as unfinished business a bill offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LADD] on last Monday.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FISHER, for two days after to-day;

To Mr. HOUK, until Monday next, on account of sickness in his family; and

To Mr. AIKEN, for one week, on account of important business.

Then, in pursuance of previous order, the House (at six o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired the House resumed its session.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. NEW addressed the committee. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Chairman, I can be but a gleaner in this debate, for all the logic of this great controversy has been gathered up by the able disputants who have passed before me over the field. At this late hour I do not hope to submit anything novel, nor do I flatter myself that I shall be able by any word of mine to influence any vote or in any wise change the resolves of the dominant party in this House. An English commoner once said:

> I have heard many arguments in Parliament that influenced my judgment, but none that ever influenced my vote.

How rare it is here that the argument controls the vote! It is indeed unfortunate that in our exasperating political discussions we too often subordinate the peace and well-being of the country to the demands of party. In my judgment the present crisis is upon the country because of the dictation of that imperious and exacting despot, a party caucus. Whole pages of our statutes are to be radically amended or wholly "wiped out," not because the people have asked it, but because a caucus regards these laws in the way of democratic success.

Depend upon it, sir, the people will not be misled by the miserable pretense that these measures interfere with the liberties of the citizen, or impair that right inestimable to every free American, the right to vote for whom he pleases. They have witnessed the peaceful, healthful operation of these laws and have uttered no word of complaint. A free people jealous of their liberty do not stand mute when it is invaded. Search the record and tell this House, tell the country, who of the millions have petitioned for the relief you are in such hot haste to give. The people are not clamoring for a repeal of the election laws. Why is it, then, that the peace of the country is disturbed by this meeting of Congress? Let the facts answer. A few weeks ago, sir, the duty of making the ordinary appropriations for the support of the Army and to carry on the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the Government devolved upon the American Congress. This was an unquestioned duty, and its performance presented no perplexing problems. The democratic party, then as now in the ascendency in this House, knew that the failure to pass these supply bills would, after the 30th of June next, most disastrously affect the public service. It was legislation never denied, and demanded by every interest of the Government, for without this relief the Government—that agent which executes the powers and protects the liberties of the people—would be seriously crippled if not altogether destroyed. The people, to whom you gentlemen are answerable, will ask the question—they are asking it every hour all over this Union—why this legislation, so indispensable to the public safety, was not passed by the Forty-fifth Congress? What excuse will you offer? Why were these bills not passed? They were matured; it was known how much money was wanted, and where and in what manner it was to be expended.

From the beginning it was little else than a matter of arithmetic, a simple sum in multiplication and addition. Bills appropriating the money necessary to carry on these departments of the Government, unburdened by irritating partisan measures, could have been passed without dissent by the Forty-fifth Congress, but Congress "dragged its weary length along" and finally adjourned without providing a farthing for these purposes. Who is responsible for this extraordinary session, the apprehension it excites, and the great expense it entails? The responsibility will be placed somewhere. There is no escape. The honest and intelligent people of this country know that these supply bills failed in the last Congress because the democratic party of this House thrust into them obnoxious political legislation; legislation for which there was no popular demand; legislation wholly foreign to the subject of appropriations and intended only to subserve party ends, and made the acceptance of this partisan legislation by the minority, by the Senate and the President, the condition upon which the Government was to have money. The undisguised purpose of the majority was to force this ill-timed and unsavory party legislation through by tacking it to measures as essential to the life of the nation as is blood to the life of the physical body.

The gentlemen on the other side told us menacingly and arrogantly, "take this dose nauseating as it is and we will give the Government so much money as it needs, refuse it and the Army, the courts, the President and Congress, the Cabinet and the whole body of executive and administrative officers, shall go penniless till the crack of doom." We were unwilling to do this unmanly and cowardly thing, although ready to make any honorable concession to save the country the infliction of an extra session of Congress.

Three extraneous and purely partisan measures were put as riders upon these bills by the majority in the last Congress. First, the abolition of the so-called test oath; second, the repeal of sections 2002 and 5528 of the statutes in regard to the employment of troops to keep the peace at the polls; and third, the abrogation of certain laws authorizing the use of deputy marshals and United States supervisors at national elections. The republican minority were anxious to save the people the expense of this session and avoid the great embarrassment to the public service the failure to make appropriations would necessarily occasion. We therefore offered to adjust, fairly and honorably, the differences that existed between the majority and ourselves, but our overtures went for nothing. The majority knew that upon the conditions then proposed these bills could be passed and an extra session avoided. We proposed to yield two if the democracy would yield one point of the differences then existing. I submit to the country that this proposition for compromise was a magnanimous one. We were ready to concede the abolition of the test oath and the repeal of the two sections in regard to the use of the Army, and only insisted upon retaining the election laws—laws that we believed could not be surrendered without placing our popular elections at the mercy of the mob. How was this proposition for compromise met? The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. ATKINS] said:

> What might have been effected if the whole subject had been left to the conferees themselves, and to themselves alone, it is not necessary for me here to say; nor am I warranted in saying even that they could have come to a conclusion. But they each felt that there was a power behind them which would admit of no agreement. The disagreement between them is radical.

Again he says:

> Speaking for myself alone it seems to me the majority, having demanded the repeal of these iniquitous laws, have reached a point where retreat is impossible, and where it will be easier to go through than to retrace their steps.

And the majority resolved "to go through," every offer of adjustment was rejected, the Forty-fifth Congress was dissolved, and the means for carrying on the Government were not provided. But the efforts of the minority to avoid an extra session of Congress did not end with the rejection of their proposal for compromise. To tide the Government over until Congress could meet in regular session next December, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Foster] asked leave to introduce and pass under a suspension of the rules a bill to provide temporarily for the expenses of the Government.

This was refused. This, gentlemen, is history. It is before the country and the people will judge us by it. But, gentlemen, you have changed front since the last Congress. You then proposed to repeal by the Army bill certain sections concerning the use of the Army, and the Army alone, but you now propose to strike down the civil power as well. You have advanced your lines. You trained your guns then on the Army, but now you propose to capture the civil authority. The difference between what you then attempted and now demand is clearly stated by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and as our position has been misrepresented I ask to read from his remarks of the 4th of April. He said:

> Now, Mr. Chairman, let me add a word in conclusion, lest I may be misunderstood. I said last session, and I have said since, that if you want this whole statute concerning the use of the Army at the polls torn from your books, I will help you to do it. If you will offer a naked proposition to repeal those two sections of the Revised Statutes named in the sixth section of this bill, I will vote with you. But you do not ask a repeal of those sections. Why? They impose restrictions upon the use of the Army, limiting its functions and punishing its officers for any infraction of these limitations; but you ask to strike out a negative clause, thereby making new and affirmative legislation of the most sweeping and dangerous character.
> Your proposed modification of the law affects not the Army alone, but the whole civil power of the United States. "Civil officers" are included in these sections; and if the proposed amendment be adopted, you deny to any civil officer of the United States any power whatever to summon the armed posse to help him enforce the processes of the law. If you pass the section in that form, you impose restrictions upon the civil authorities of the United States never before proposed in any Congress by any legislator since this Government began. I say, therefore, in the shape you propose this, it is much the worst of all your "riders." In the beginning of this contest we understood that you desired only to get the Army away from the polls. As that would still leave the civil officers full power to keep the peace at the polls, I thought it was the least important and the least dangerous of your demands; but as you have put it here, it is the most dangerous. If you reenact it in the shape presented, it becomes a later law than the supervisors and marshals law, and pro tanto repeals the latter. As it stands now in the statute-book, it is the earlier statute, and is pro tanto itself repealed by the marshals law of 1871, and is therefore harmless so far as it relates to civil officers. But if you put it in here, you deny the power of the marshals of the United States to perform their duties whenever a riot may require the use of an armed posse.

This states the whole case. It is said that "revolutions never go backward." This one gives point to the saying, for it has not only gone forward, but has grown more arrogant and exacting. It has increased its demands. We are again confronted by the same questions that defeated the appropriations in the last Congress. We are again admonished that we must accept legislation intensely partisan or the Government must go without money. Do you imagine, gentlemen, that your programme for subjugation will succeed? Is your victory assured? You mistake yourselves. You forget your weakness. True, a republican Senate no longer obstructs your work, but there is one obstacle in your way, the power to veto which the Constitution you adore vests in the Executive. You have thought in your desperation you might subjugate the President. It has been broadly insinuated on this floor that the tenure by which he held his high office was by far too frail to withstand the pressure of a veto. Wait, gentlemen, and you will see. With this insinuation you couple the threat that if the right of veto is exercised and your "grievances not redressed," you will for all time withhold supplies. I know your desperate courage, but you dare not do this thing. Should you stop the wheels of Government, close the Departments, close the courts, leave the Army and Navy to starve and our ships to rot, an indignant and outraged people would wither you with their curses. When it becomes possible for one department of the nation to coerce another, its equal, by this kind of duress, it will be a sad day for constitutional government. And yet you are attempting to do this thing this very day in the American Congress. This page of our history has its parallel. The Irish volunteers in 1778 inscribed on their cannon "free trade or this." That meant coercion. A democratic Congress writes on the muzzle of its appropriation bills "this, or no money," and it means coercion. The people understand this thing. What the President will do, what answer he will make to this democratic menace, I do not know and I will not conjecture, but I know that no act of legislation is complete until it has received his approval or been passed over his negative by a two-thirds vote of each House of Congress. I know moreover that the veto power is always well employed when it is done to arrest ill-timed, unwise, and unjust partisan legislation. If the President should find it his duty, under his oath and according to his conscience and his judgment, to veto these bills, should they pass, the people will not be inconsolable. An enlightened and patriotic people always admire a public servant who has the pluck to accept any responsibility which his convictions of duty imposes.

THE METHODS EMPLOYED.

But, sir, we come to the merits of this question. And first, I earnestly protest against the methods employed to compel the repeal of these statutes. That they have been employed heretofore does not commend them, for I will follow no precedent that my conscience and my judgment condemn. On this question I have tried to be consistent. From the day I took my seat in this House to this hour I have voted steadfastly against putting general legislation into bills of the kind under discussion. This method of law-making is, in my opinion, wholly indefensible and utterly vicious. That which cannot be passed on its merits is unworthy a place in the statutes of a free people. The fact that a measure has to be tacked to an appropriation is conclusive proof that it seeks to accomplish some end that does not commend itself to the free judgment of the legislative power. There is nothing in the past of this practice to commend it to favor. For one, at least, I am unwilling it shall go unchallenged. We have all acknowledged its unfairness, and we are now in the presence of its dangers. If it is to prevail it will become the efficient ally of revolutionists and the refuge of safety for every conceivable legislative iniquity.

THE BARRIERS SHOULD NOT BE REMOVED.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not maintain that these statutes, the election laws, provide the best possible protection for the ballot. They may need revision, but I have no sympathy with the present partisan effort to remove the barriers and weaken the defenses that tend to secure a free, peaceable, and pure national election. The charge that these laws are but radical election machinery intended only to keep the republican party in power is but the bluster of democratic rhetoric. If this insinuation was worthy an answer I would respond; if laws that give the people the opportunity for a free and fair election tend to keep the republican party in power, it is but right that it control the Government. No party is fit to live a single hour that denies the right of free thought, free speech, or a free ballot. The republican party has stood on this platform and proclaimed this gospel in evil as well as good report. In the defense of these principles many of its bravest hearts have gone down in the van of the battle. We would have our elections so entirely free that every man entitled to the ballot, whatever his condition, race, religion, or politics, might, without fear of violence or social ostracism, vote the ticket of his choice. The republican party would have elections honestly conducted, and would, had it the power, make intimidation, ballot-box stuffing, repeating, tissue tickets, and every kind of fraud and partisan outrage on the franchise that now corrupts the very sources of political power, impossible forever. To secure these results it asks but law, judicious, constitutional law. To make certain the right to cast a free ballot it demands the most efficient methods that an enlightened and patriotic statesmanship can devise, and that they be enforced, when necessary, by every power of the Government, civil and military; for when the ballot-box no longer gives expression to the voice of the people, popular government is a most shameless pretense.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION.

Are these laws unconstitutional? You so pronounce them. This is a question proper for the courts, and why not settle it there? Smite them with a judicial decision. Submit your case, gentlemen, to the Supreme Court, the highest judicial tribunal in the nation, and if that court pronounces these laws unconstitutional the people will be satisfied. Do not dodge the issue. Drag these statutes before the courts, and tomahawk them there if you can. They have been enforced for a decade, and yet you have not dared to subject them to the judicial test. Are you afraid of the courts? If you are, it is a confession that you regard the democratic position as indefensible.

I enter upon a very brief discussion of the constitutional question with much trepidation. I must pass over a beaten track. After the learned and elaborate arguments already submitted on this phase of the controversy, nothing is left me but to gather up the fragments.

I concede this to be a government of delegated powers. "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States respectively or to the people." These are the words of the tenth amendment.

The eighth section of the Constitution enumerates the powers of the United States, and in conclusion says that Congress shall have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary to carry into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested in the Government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof."

Here it is given Congress to legislate for the execution, first, of the enumerated powers; and, secondly, "all other powers vested in the Government of the United States." How have these provisions been construed by Congress and the Supreme Court? Let us see how they have defined the duty and power of the nation in enforcing the third clause of the second section of the Constitution. It is the obsolete fugitive slave clause, and reads:

No person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due.

This delegates to the United States no power whatever. It simply asserts that fugitives shall not be withheld but shall be delivered up. Delivered up by what government, that of the State or that of the nation? The Constitution is silent upon the point. Clearly if the strict construction that obtains on the other side of the House is to prevail the whole power over escaping slaves was lodged in the States, for as that power was "not delegated to the United States, nor prohibited to the States, it was reserved to the States respectively." But Congress under this power enacted the most obnoxious fugitive-slave laws, the courts upheld them, and the Executive enforced them. In the case of Prigg vs. The State of Pennsylvania a majority of the judges held that the power to enforce this provision of the Constitution was exclusively in the General Government. Justice McLean, in the case of the fugitive McQuery, says:

It is admitted that there is no power in the Federal Government to force any legislative action on a State. But if the Constitution guarantees a right to a master of a slave, * * * the power is given to effectuate that right.

Now, if the Constitution has created a House of Representatives, clothed it with legislative functions, and made it a necessary department of the Government, it is unquestionably within the power of Congress to make any law necessary to its preservation. This power must reside in the United States, because, as Judge McLean states it, "the Government cannot force the State to take legislative action." The States by mere non-action might absolutely destroy the nation. They might merely fail to provide for "the time, place, or manner" of holding congressional elections, and this House would perish. I do not deny the right or power of the States to make and enforce police regulations to preserve the peace and make sure the right to vote without molestation. I deny, however, that they possess this power to the exclusion of the National Government. The right of suffrage is of the essence of democratic institutions; "it is a fundamental article in republican government." The right is established and defined in the Constitution. The regulation of national elections is vested primarily in the State Legislatures, but ultimately in Congress; and in the language of the Federalist, "this was deemed essential that the Government should contain in itself the means of its own preservation."

Am I now asked in what part of the Constitution I find the power conferred on the Government to supervise its own elections? I answer, first, in that part of it that creates that branch of its legislative power, the House of Representatives. What is this House? It is the creature of the Constitution—an indispensable branch of the law-making power. Without it there could be no constitutional government. To claim that the nation may regulate the election of members of this body is but to assert that this House has the constitutional right to live and that life so essential to free government is under the guardianship of the Government. By what law is the representative in this branch of Congress created? He owes his existence wholly to the Constitution of the United States, but the Constitution commits his election to certain persons in the States. The State does not confer the right to vote for a member of this House upon any one, but it makes a certain class of its citizens legal voters in the election of members of the most numerous branch of its Legislature and the Constitution casts upon that class the right to elect Representatives to Congress. When one of these citizens votes he does so by virtue of the power conferred on him by the national Constitution. Again, Representatives are apportioned among the States, their qualifications prescribed, and the duration of their office fixed by the Constitution. When one assumes to be a member of Congress his right to exercise that function is not determined by his State, but the final and irreversible judgment on that question is pronounced by a tribunal deriving all its powers and jurisdiction from the Constitution. Without the Constitution there could be no Congress, and without the Congress there could be no National Government.

Nothing can be more evident—

Said Alexander Hamilton—

than that the exclusive power of regulating elections for the National Government in the hands of the State Legislatures would leave the existence of the Union entirely at their mercy. They could at any moment annihilate it by neglecting to provide for the choice of persons to administer its affairs.

The first article of the Constitution provides that the time, place, and manner of holding elections for Representatives in Congress shall be prescribed by the State Legislatures, but Congress may "at any time by law make or alter such regulations." Congress may, therefore, at any time make regulations as to the time, place, or manner of holding congressional elections in the States. Some gentlemen are disposed to give this section a very narrow and technical construction. They say, "True, Congress may fix the time and place for the election and prescribe the manner for conducting it, but here the power of the Government ends." Now, I submit if the Constitution has provided that the legislative power shall in part reside in the House of Representatives, has provided for agents to execute this power, and has reserved to itself the right to fix the time and place and regulate the manner of electing these agents, Congress, under the eighth section of the Constitution, may unquestionably make all laws which shall be necessary to carry into execution these powers. To deny this is to say that the United States has a legislative function, but no power to make it effective or protect its existence. It is assumed, however, that whatever power Congress may possess in regard to the time, place, and manner of holding elections, and preserving the legislative function, it may not intervene to protect the person of the voter so that he may safely exercise the right of suffrage. In support of this position a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States has been frequently referred to in this debate. In that case it was held that the United States has no jurisdiction to try and punish "a conspiracy to falsely imprison and murder citizens of the United States within the territory of a State." The court very properly held that the duty and power of protecting the citizen in the enjoyment of his "natural rights" resided wholly in the State government. "Sovereignty for this purpose," said the Chief-Justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, "rests alone in the State." No one questions this. To make and enforce laws securing these rights is clearly within the reserved or unprohibited powers of the States. The Government of the United States does not assume jurisdiction of assaults, riots, or murder as offenses against the natural rights of the citizen, but if the assault, riot, or murder prevents or obstructs the exercise of any right or the execution of any duty secured or imposed by the law of the nation, made in conformity to the Constitution, a crime is committed against the Government which it may declare and punish. Congress does not assume by its election laws to prohibit these offenses and punish them because they strike down the personal right of liberty or life, but for the reason that intimidation, fraud, riots, and murder prevent a free and honest national election, interfere with the operations of the Government, impair its powers, arrest its methods, tend to the destruction of its prerogatives, and, in fact, attack in the most vital point its very existence.

THE DUTY TO ENFORCE THE LAW.

If it be true that the nation may by law protect its own elections in the States, the duty of the Executive to enforce the law when made will not be controverted.

The power to enforce obedience to law should be ample. The duty of keeping peace at the polls and protecting the ballot should be given to the civil authorities. They should be armed with the power to arrest when a crime against the elective franchise is committed. The duty should be enjoined upon them to keep the peace at elections, to give every legal voter an opportunity to deposit his ballot without being molested, and generally to prevent any fraud or repress any tumult or disorder that interferes with the due execution of the election laws. The republican Congress did this, and no more than this, in providing for the presence of United States supervisors, marshals, and deputy marshals at the polls on election day. But Congress may rightfully go further than this. It may supplement the civil by the military power. It may provide by law for calling forth the military arm of the Government to execute the laws. When the civil authorities are resisted they may call to their aid force, all the force necessary to execute their mandates. The citizen, the State militia, and the regular Army are all parts of the posse comitatus and are subject to be summoned to the aid of the officer of the law.

That all this may be done will not be denied; but, in support of the position, I beg leave to quote a single authority. Mr. Cushing, speaking of the posse comitatus and the power of the marshal to summon it, says:

This authority comprehends not only bystanders and other citizens generally, but any and all organized armed forces, whether militia of the State or officers, soldiers, sailors, and marines of the United States; and if the object of resistance to the marshal be to obstruct and defeat the execution of the provisions of the Constitution or acts of Congress the expenses of such posse comitatus are properly charged to the United States.

But I go further, and insist, if the Government has good reason to apprehend that its laws will, on some particular day or at some particular place, be defied, and its agents resisted by a force that cannot be suppressed by the ordinary methods, it may in advance place within the easy reach of its agents so much of its Army as may be necessary to aid them in the enforcement of the laws. To deny this is to deny the nation's right of self-preservation. The employment of supervisors, marshals, deputy marshals, and armed troops has been authorized solely for the purpose of securing prompt and peaceable obedience to law. No other end was to be achieved.

The republican party has been charged with a purpose to put the military over the civil power. No such thing is proposed. We believe in the subordination of the military to the civil power, but we are willing to use armed force rather than have the laws of the land and the rights and liberties of the people subordinated to the relentless despotism of a mob of cut-throats that seek to overthrow all the safeguards of free government. All we have done, all we desire to do, is to organize law in the defense of a free and uncoerced ballot, believing as we do, that a fair and honest election is the very breath and blood of republican institutions.

IS GOVERNMENT CONTROL DANGEROUS.

It is said that to place the power of supervising congressional elections in the Government is dangerous because the national Administration is in the hands of a political party, and this power might be made to subserve partisan purposes. But have gentlemen forgotten that a State is as much under the control of a political party as the nation? Is a democratic governor or Legislature less partisan than a republican President or Congress? If the United States may lend its power to a party to keep it in the ascendency, may not a State do the same thing? If United States marshals may employ their official positions to intimidate voters, may not a State constabulary do it also? Are United States supervisors taken from each of the political parties more dangerous to the freedom and fairness of elections than a local police made up wholly from one party? What is more partisan than a city police?

But, Mr. Chairman, I have conceded the right of States primarily to regulate the elections of members of this body. I prefer personally the States should exercise the power. There are many reasons why they should do this. No one desires to interfere with the prerogatives of the State.

Suppose, however, the States or any State fails to secure a free and fair election either for want of physical power or want of inclination to do so, what then? Then, sir, as I have said, this duty rests upon the Government, and it should perform it promptly and fearlessly.

Let the States make the right of suffrage secure and the people of all parties will be content.

Do the States protect the voter? Do the States give the citizen a free, honest, and peaceful election? No, sir. If there is any truth in the history of this country during the last few years, as it has been written by eye-witnesses, by congressional investigating committees, and in the records of the courts, the voter in several of the States has been deliberately robbed of his right of suffrage. Speaking in the light of this history, I declare that almost every possible crime has been committed upon the integrity of the ballot-box. Mob violence and fraud in many localities have made fair elections impossible. In some sections of this Union, Mr. Chairman, a man voted the republican ticket at the peril of his life.

If we can confide in human testimony these frauds and outrages have been persistent and long continued. The local authorities have been unwilling to prevent them or powerless to do so. I shall refer to instances of anarchy in some of the States to prove that conditions have existed in the past when free elections would have been impossible without the intervention of a power more potent than the local authorities. The paroxysm of fury that explodes in riot on the election day is not so much to be dreaded as that organized rage that comes before it and paralyzes the country with fear. The terror inspired by a brute force that rides booted and spurred, threatening and scourging before the election day, is perhaps the most dangerous foe to our elective system. The brute force that drives the citizen from the poll no more destroys the liberty of the ballot than that systematized fury that deters him from going to the election. If the Government may not protect him from either, it is a conspicuous failure. As I pass along I will give shocking instances of both these types. I begin ten years back in my review of this gloomy record.

A special committee of the Tennessee Legislature in 1868 reported that in Middle Tennessee numerous murders and other outrages of the most aggravated character were being committed. The committee said:

In these counties a reign of terror exists which is so absolute in its nature that the best citizens are unable or unwilling to give free expression to their opinions. The terror inspired is so absolute that the officers of the law are powerless to execute its provisions, to discharge their duties, or to bring the guilty perpetrators to punishment. * * * These marauders bid defiance to the civil authorities and threaten to drive out every man, white or black, who does not submit to their arbitrary dictation.

Happily this turbulence has passed away from this State, but that it once existed proves its possible recurrence. I come now to the State of Louisiana. My authority is the current history of those unhappy days. At the May election of 1868 the republicans carried the State of Louisiana by 26,000 majority and in November the democratic majority was 41,000. In the spring, in the fifteen parishes of Bienville, Bossier, Caddo, Claiborne, De Soto, Jackson, La Fayette, Morehouse, Sabine, Saint Bernard, Saint Martin's, Saint Landry, Union, Vermillion, and Washington the republicans cast 10,323 votes, and in November the total republican vote was but 35. There was a falling off of over 10,200 votes in fifteen parishes. How was this extraordinary change wrought in the politics of Louisiana? A member of the congressional committee appointed to investigate the election frauds in that State that year writes:

The testimony shows that over two thousand persons were killed, wounded, and otherwise injured in that State within a few weeks prior to the presidential election; that half of the State was overrun by violence; midnight raids, secret murders, and open riot kept the people in constant terror until the republicans surrendered all claims.

* * * * * * *

The parish of Orleans contained 29,910 voters, 15,020 of which were colored. In the spring of 1868 that parish gave 13,973 republican votes. In the fall it gave Grant 1,178, a falling off of 12,795 votes. Previous to the election notices were scattered through the city warning colored men not to vote. * * * But the most remarkable case is that of Saint Landry, a planting parish on the river Teche. Here the republicans had a registered majority of 1,071 votes. In the spring they carried it by 678 majority. In the fall they gave Grant no vote—not one—while the democrats cast 4,787 votes, the full vote of the parish, for Seymour and Blair. Here occurred one of the bloodiest riots on record, in which the ku-klux killed and murdered over two hundred republicans, hunting and chasing them for two days and nights through fields and swamps. Thirteen captives were taken from the jail and shot. A pile of twenty-five dead bodies were found half-buried in the woods. Having conquered the republicans, killed and driven off the white leaders, they captured the masses of the colored voters, marked them with badges of red flannel, enrolled them in clubs, led them to the polls, and made them vote the democratic ticket, and gave them certificates of the fact.

Has there been a marked and hopeful improvement in Louisiana? We shall see as we proceed. How about South Carolina?

In 1871 the grand jury of the United States circuit court in their report to the court say that the most revolting and atrocious crimes were committed during the preceding year upon the colored people in that State, and especially in the counties of Union, York, and Spartanburgh. I will quote one paragraph only from that elaborate report:

Organized bands inflicted summary vengeance on the colored citizens of these counties by breaking into their houses at the dead of night, dragging them from their beds, torturing them in the most inhuman manner, and in many instances murdering them; and this merely on account of their political affiliations. Occasionally additional reasons operated, but in no instance was the political feature wanting.

I could cite from the current history of these days of anarchy innumerable instances of the most horrid and revolting outrages committed upon a poor, defenseless, and unoffending people in North Carolina, Alabama, Mississippi, and other States because of their politics, but those already given answer my purpose. To these pages of infamy I refer regretfully. They are a reproach to democratic government—a deep and damnable disgrace to the age in which we live. My only object in calling the attention of the House and the country to these matters is to show there are times when free thought and voluntary political action in portions of this Republic are impossible without the intervention of the mailed hand of the National Government. Look at the last elections in Louisiana and South Carolina. History is but repeating itself. A committee of the Senate has just reported upon these elections. That report and the evidence taken are before the country. In Louisiana the investigation was confined to the parishes of Caddo, Natchitoches, Tensas, Concordia, Point Coupée, Saint Mary's, and New Orleans, seven in all. The report says:

In these seven parishes there were murdered for political purposes during the campaign twenty-three persons: John Williams, Robert Williams, Luke Wiggins, Lot Clarke, Billy White, Green Abrams, Josiah Thomas, Charles Bethel, William Singleton, Monday Hill, Lewis Postlewaite, Richard Miller, James Starver, Commodore Smallwood, Charley Carroll, John Higgins, Doc. Smith, William Hunter, Hyams Wilson, Wash. Ellis, Asbury Epps, John Robinson, and Rufus Mills. Besides these there were fully as many others murdered whose names the committee were unable to ascertain, whose corpses were seen by witnesses who testified before the committee hanging on trees or lying dead in the streets or fields. Dozens more were wounded from shots fired at them with murderous intent, some of whom were present before the committee exhibiting their scars; others were whipped or beaten and mutilated; wives were tied up by the thumbs and whipped for refusing to tell where their husbands were secreted; scores of leaders in politics among the colored men were driven from their homes, leaving their crops in the fields and their families unprovided for. In brief, a literal "reign of terror" existed, and in fact still exists, over a considerable portion of Louisiana as the result of the policy adopted by the democracy for the purpose of perpetuating their rule in that State.

The truth of this report is denied, but the evidence taken by the committee fully supports it.

In South Carolina democratic methods for securing a party victory were somewhat less sanguinary but no less effective. The result was always the same—the democratic ticket was counted in, in utter disregard to fairness or common honesty. When in 1876 Charleston County returned seventeen republicans to the Legislature by an average majority of about six thousand, the Hampton government turned them all out upon the cowardly pretext that the colored republicans had bulldozed and intimidated the white chivalry on election day. A special election resulted in a sweeping democratic victory; its ticket was elected by a unanimous vote, although the colored population of the county outnumbered the white population by more than fifty thousand. But, sir, I come to the election of 1878. Here frauds were systematized. To make sure the election polling places were changed or abolished, particularly in the republican counties of Charleston, Colleton, Beaufort, and Orangeburgh, so that voters were compelled to travel from twenty to forty miles to reach the polls. Ballot-box stuffing, tissue tickets, and false registrations were the order of the day. Dead men and imaginary men were placed on the poll lists as legal voters. At one poll there seemed to be a numerous family of Bulls, for there were registered John Bull, Jacob Bull, Tom Bull, Isardis Bull, Jim Bull, and Peter Bullwinkle. These were unknown to the oldest inhabitants. But the most amiable and ingenious villainy resorted to to subvert and corrupt the election was the device of tissue ballots. Fifty of these were, in some instances, cast by a single voter. When the ballots in the box were found to exceed in number the names on the poll lists, after counting all the dead men and men of straw—all the Bulls and Bullwinkles—the tickets were all returned to the box, thoroughly mixed, and then a blindfolded man drew out the excess, and those remaining were counted. A mere touch was sufficient to distinguish the tissue ticket, and it was always left to be counted as an honest ballot. This was done to secure a fair count "according to law." This infamous invention did not fail its corrupt projectors. It was a conspicuous success. Let me read the testimony of Robert Grover, a colored man, who was the republican challenger at the poll at Jacksonburgh, in Colleton County. He tells in his uncouth but inimitable way how it was done. I read from pages 661 and 662, Teller committee report:

Question. Were you present at the counting of the votes?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. Now you may state what occurred at the counting.
A. After they got through voting the box was opened and all the tickets were picked out—democrats here and republicans there. They were not counting them then, but just separating them. In opening the tickets (I was sitting right behind the clerk) the very first one he opened I saw, and as he unfolded it I saw a ticket about the size of this little tissue ballot roll out; although this tissue ballot is not one of the same kind as that which dropped out. The moment I saw that drop I was astonished. It was directed that none of the republican voters should vote anything but one straight republican ticket. The moment I saw that drop out I went over to Captain Gray's and said to him, "Well, it don't pay us to count. If seven come out of one what in the devil is the use of our counting?"
Q. What did Captain Gray say?
A. "Oh," he said, "never mind; we will bring this out peaceably." "Yes," I said, "I want it done peaceably, but honestly," and at the same time a friend of mine came to me and touched me. As I had instructed the people not to have any disturbance, I thought it would not do for me to be the first to make a disturbance. The first time I saw seven, and the second time I saw five, and when they opened another I saw as high as sixteen in one ballot. I said, "Jesus! God Almighty! There is no use for me to count." I never got excited until I saw thirty-seven come out of one. I started for Captain Gray's, and I said I did not blame the democrats for these papers, "but," I said, "I believe you are the one that brought these men here." When I first spoke to him it was secretly, for I didn't want to alarm the others. It went on further, and it went as high as fifty-nine on one ticket. I said, "Gracious God! I had better go home." I said, "When you take out this fine silk paper all night you will nearly carry the election!" Then we went on counting. When I saw fifty-nine I was doubtful immediately.
Q. Were these tissue tickets?
A. Yes, sir; every one of them. After we got through counting I said, "Now, Captain Gray, as an honest man, you who have seven times as much honor as me who is as black as the ace of spades, why does this happen? Why does this hat hatch out democratic tickets and not republican? "Well," he said, "a man can vote as much as he wants to; he can vote fifty tickets if he wants to." "Well," I said, "that is no law for me." I thought as an honest republican I could put in one vote, but that was all I was entitled to. We went on further until we got through counting, and when we got through counting the democrats were 530 and the republicans were 636.
Q. How many did you have on your poll list?
A. Well, there was 900. In regard to the little democratic tickets, one of the managers said, "It don't make any difference, we can tear up these tickets." He said, "All you do is to put them carefully by themselves until we count them out, and if you are entitled to them you can have them." When we got through there was two hundred and something over the poll list; I don't exactly know what it was.
Q. Well, they drew out the extra ones; were there more votes in the box than names on the poll list?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How many more?
A. There was 900 altogether on the poll list.
Q. There was 226 extra; now how did they dispose of those?
A. The three managers then said, "How shall we manage?" It seemed they didn't ask me directly, but I didn't mind that; I, however, took a part as I took an interest in it. It seems that all the eyes on our side were right on me, and I thought it was my duty to face them. It seems like they wanted me to say or do something in the matter, and I said, "Gentlemen, go according to law and then it will be all right." Then one of the managers replied that the law requires that they must be thrown in the box where they can be thoroughly stirred up, and picked out one at a time. My reply was, "If you do it, when doing it I want you to understand that you shall not take any advantage of me, for you have done it already." I said common judgment will lead me to know what to do. I took up one of the tickets and said, "You can feel that immediately." "And," said I, "here is a straight-out democratic ticket, you can tell that at once." "And," said I, "here is the republican ticket, put on good paper, and you can tell them too." Well, they went on, as they said, according to law. There was one hundred and ninety or something torn up of the republican tickets. Then I called their attention to the fact, and I said, "I told you before that that is the way it would happen." The republicans had no opportunity to elect anything. I thought as I had instructed the people not to make any disturbance it would not do for me to create any myself, and so I wanted the result to be made up peaceably. I felt very bad, going out as I did with a very bad cold, but I was obliged to go. They were mad, that is, my friends, because the tickets were torn up, and I had to talk to them to quiet them the best I could.

No wonder this unsophisticated negro "was doubtful immediately" when he saw the fifty-nine tissue tickets drop from one ballot. That he exploded with a little profane indignation when he saw "the hat hatched nothing but democratic tickets" was pardonable. Nobody, Mr. Chairman, has the courage to openly defend such rascality. But with what alacrity gentlemen sometimes come to the rescue of the person who holds his certificate of election by reason of it! King Louis said his chancellor was a scoundrel, but he could not do without him, and you know these pretended elections to be but bald frauds, but you seem unwilling to get on without their help.

During the campaign of 1878 fraud and force held high carnival. Ballot-boxes were stuffed; armed men broke up republican meetings; ballot-boxes were seized and the tickets and tally-sheets destroyed; United States supervisors were driven from the polls; men—native-born white men—were compelled by the mob to leave their homes and seek safety in flight; armed and organized bands rode through the parishes, whipping, shooting, hanging, and drowning. And this "whole contagion of hell" was not let loose to defeat northern scallawags and ragamuffins, for no carpet-bag interloper had a place on any ticket. This war seems to have been made largely upon the supporters of an independent political movement. Do gentlemen call a poll taken under these circumstances and with these surroundings an election. It could be nothing but a miserable farce, a horrid mockery. I ask, Mr. Chairman, if elections are to be run by the methods I have mentioned, if popular government is not at an end. Let me quote here an extract from a letter of Horace Greeley to Samuel J. Tilden, written in regard to the election frauds in New York in 1868. I most cordially indorse it:

> Whenever it shall be generally understood that the results of the elections are not determined by the ballots of legal voters, but by frauds in voting or frauds in counting, then the advent of avowed, unequivocal despotism must be near at hand. Between the rule of an emperor and the rule of a clique of ballot-box stuffers, every intelligent man must prefer the former as less rapacious and more responsible. When honest citizens shall avoid the polls, asking "What is the use of voting? the result is already fixed," the days of the Republic will be numbered. Between a ruler who prohibits voting altogether and the gang who make it a sham by filling the ballot-boxes with illegal votes, or miscounting those actually cast, the sway of the former is every way preferable.

Speaking for myself, I repeat that I hope it may never be necessary to send armed men to polling places, but rather than see republican institutions assassinated by armed marauders I would encamp the standing Army in sight of every voting precinct in the nation.

I know nothing about the truthfulness of the evidence taken by the Teller committee. I hope for the credit of American character it may turn out that these statements are exaggerated. But election frauds and outrages have not been confined to any section. The elections in our populous cities in the North have been carried, not by force and menace perhaps, but by repeaters and bummers, who mercilessly crucified the popular will by repeating and manipulating tickets and ballot-boxes. New York and Cincinnati especially have contributed their full quota to this record of shame.

I have shown, Mr. Chairman, or at least I have tried to do so, that the United States has the power to make and enforce laws protecting its own elections; that there exists a necessity for the employment of that power; and now I beg to discuss another question for a few moments.

HAS THE GOVERNMENT ABUSED ITS POWER?

Has the Government, under republican control, abused the powers conferred upon it by election laws?

Has any officer or enlisted man, in the performance of any duty under the law, committed any act of violence or outrage?

I have listened attentively, sir, to this entire discussion, and must confess my surprise that no grave offense has been imputed by anybody, within my hearing, to the military. It is a compliment to its discipline and its chivalry. Look at the facts as they stand in the record of the elections. The States of the South—those States that were to "be subjugated by bayonet rule"—have been constantly increasing their democratic majorities. With all the appliances of "centralized power," of force-bills, election laws, supervisors, marshals, and bayonets, the total votes of the States have grown larger every year. Take Mississippi from 1868 to 1876. In 1868 its total vote was 118,393; in 1872 it was 129,463, and in 1876 it reached 164,778. This is true of the States generally. The Administration has had for eighteen years the Army under its control, and yet an adverse Congress sits in this Capitol. The fifteen States of the South return, with three exceptions, a solid democratic representation. Of 192 democratic Senators and Representatives in this Congress 129 of them were elected by these States. There has been no interference with individual liberty or the right of suffrage. Occasional instances may be given where the power has been abused or where the law has not been wisely executed, but if this be an objection it may be made to every law of the land. Every law is subject to abuse, and human agents are never perfect. Before condemning a statute let it be honestly enforced in its spirit, and then judge it by its results. A notable instance of the effect of the employment of troops at the polls was given in the debate the other day by the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. WAIT.] At the congressional election of 1876 there were distributed among the thirty-nine election precincts in the four counties of Edgefield, Barnwell, Colleton, and Beaufort, in South Carolina, 507 United States troops. The total vote of these counties was 12,056, and 6,297 of these were cast for the republican and 5,659 for the democratic candidate. The democratic candidate carried two counties, Edgefield and Barnwell, and the republican candidate carried two, Colleton and Beaufort. The democratic vote was largest where the greatest number of troops were stationed. The largest number stationed at any precinct was at Edgefield Court-House, and there the democratic candidate received a majority. This election was peaceable and fair. There were no riots, no coercion, no intimidation.

Our past experience, the increasing asperities of the political campaign, the insatiable greed of the politician, and the growing disposition to disregard fairness and honesty in elections, admonish us to intrench the ballot about with the most rigid defenses. Mr. Chairman, we are rapidly losing our power to secure a just enforcement of the law. To inflame the minds of the people and create a spirit of disquiet and unrest partisan speakers and a partisan press traduce every department of established authority. The President is denounced as a usurper and the nation, under republican administration, as a centralized despotism. When courts indict, arrest, and bring to trial persons charged with the most atrocious outrages upon the citizens and the franchise, the prosecuting officers of the Government are denounced as malignant and the judges assailed as vindictive partisans. If there is an acquittal the accused are given ovations and received by enthusiastic processions with music and banners; but if justice is done and the laws vindicated by a conviction, the triers are anathematized as "niggers" or ignorant whites packed into the jury-box to convict. These assaults encourage law-breaking and violence. The miscreant who stuffs the ballot-box, the rough who repeats, the swaggering desperado who, armed and disguised, terrorizes over the country and keeps the voter from the election, or who drives him from the polls or compels him to vote at the muzzle of the shot-gun, takes fresh courage from all these attempts to cast odium upon national authority and to render difficult the enforcement of the law.

Now I am done with this question and will ask the indulgence of the committee but a few moments longer.

We have been admonished, sir, time and again since this debate was opened, that the sad history of the war must be kept out of sight—that we must forbear to draw upon it either to enforce a lesson or illustrate an argument. All allusion to the rebellion is unpatriotic and is reprimanded as an attempt to reopen the wounds and renew the bitterness of the strife. And yet, in the teeth of these protests, the rebellion, merciless and bloody as it was, has been excused if not justified on the ground that the North provoked it by "Boston riots, Kansas wars, and John Brown raids." We are told moreover, sir, that the South in attempting to secede, simply "exercised the Heaven-given inalienable right declared at Philadelphia and consecrated at Bunker Hill and Valley Forge." That I do not garble or misrepresent, I quote the language employed on this floor by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. JONES.] He said:

> A little school sprang up and began to teach contempt and hate for the Constitution of our fathers. Pandora's box was opened. All know the evils that rushed out. Boston riots, Kansas wars, John Brown raids, personal-liberty laws; but why recount? Madness fell upon the people. Douglas was mocked and hissed in Chicago. Webster was denied a hearing in Faneuil Hall. The South became alarmed. Distrusting the sufficiency of the Government to protect, and fearing its machinery to oppress, the southern people in the exercise of the Heaven-given inalienable right declared at Philadelphia and consecrated at Bunker Hill and Valley Forge, attempted to secede, and following the example of their revolutionary sires, to form a new government laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them seemed best. War ensued.

I do not object to these references to the war, or to a discussion of its causes. I say in the words of Draper:

> Let us put this sad and gloomy history—this fearful experience—in the primer of every child; let us make it the staple of the novel of every school-girl; let us tear from this bloody conflict its false grandeur and tinsel glories and set it naked in the light of day, a spectacle to blanch the cheek of the bravest man and make the heart of every mother flutter as she sits by her cradle.

I will observe the injunction and be silent. I will not

> Harrow up the soul, freeze up the blood,

by holding up the utter wreck and universal ruin brought upon the country by that most wicked revolt against constitutional liberty and the Union of the States. It is too late to charge the war to the abolitionists of Boston or to the raid of John Brown. The war was the outgrowth of the restless ambition and the remorseless greed of the slave power. We tried to avoid the fearful arbitrament of arms. To save the Union we made and executed with unseemly alacrity degrading fugitive-slave laws, we abrogated most sacred compromises, pronounced Dred Scott decisions, and offered to abandon the poor slave to his hapless fate for all coming time. I regret that the war came with its flood of agony, its tears, and its terrors; I deplore its atrocities, and cover my face in shame in the presence of its unspeakable barbarisms, but am thankful that the nation triumphed, that in the fierce conflict the fetters were melted from every limb, and that to-day no American has a single link "of the chain of bondage clanking about his rags."

THE POLITICAL PARTIES CONTRASTED.

Gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber, forgetting the logic of the controversy, have made haste to arraign republican administration and the republican party for high crimes against constitutional liberty. This is a portion of the indictment presented by the eloquent and impetuous gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS:]

> Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, my time is limited, and I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me any further. When the battle was won you tore off the veil that covered your hideous deformity; you dissolved the Union that you had saved; you changed the Constitution of our fathers for which you had pretended to fight; you changed State sovereignties into military provinces; you converted the constitutional Union by usurpation into almost a military despotism presided over by a successful military chieftain; you organized returning boards that stole State governments and ended in stealing the Presidency itself. And when you had riveted the chains as you believed upon Southern States you forged chains for the States of the North.

There is more of this, but I have no time to read it now. Let me say, sir, that if there is to be a reopening of the books we are ready. Let "putrescence be uncovered" and the "fires of sectional hate be rekindled" if gentlemen wish. The democratic party has made its record and it cannot change the types. The infamy of that record during a whole decade is imperishable. Would you see it? Look back along the pathway of the years, of the last quarter of a century, if you please, and what has the democratic party done that a lover of his country can point to with pride? And yet these were eventful years—years pregnant with a great work and immense opportunities. It was a time when absolutism was measuring swords with human liberty. What did the democratic party do for liberty? Did it break a chain or unloose a fetter? Did it give freedom to a race, or reach down its strong arms and lift up to "equal rights before the law" the poor and lowly? Was it the friend of freedom or free labor? No, sir; for in every phase of the anti-slavery conflict it was the implacable foe of the slave. Human liberty never won a battle but it had to rout its hosts and break in pieces its battalions. In the day of our great peril it was unwilling that slavery should perish that the nation might live. What was democratic statesmanship in that fearful epoch when the tramp of contending armies shook the nation?

Sir, prompt and courageous action might have saved the nation from the unparalleled horrors of the civil war, but a cowardly democratic statesmanship refused to suppress the revolt or to save the public property from plunder. It cunningly devised an interpretation of the Constitution that relieved treason of its odium and made rebellion respectable. And when encouraged by this cowardice and this perfidy war came, and our institutions were put in peril, democratic policy perpetually weakened the cause of the Union and strengthened the hands of its enemies. I will not retort further. The country wants peace. Be it so.

But the gentleman says we dissolved the Union we had won. We did dissolve a union—the union with slavery, the auction-block and the slave-pen and all their barbarisms. We made a new one, leaving out of it those iniquities that went down in the storm of the battle. And "you changed the Constitution of our fathers." I do not deny it. We cut from it the decayed and shattered branches, only that liberty might have a more perfect and a more vigorous growth. We abolished slavery, and made its brood of fugitive-slave laws and spawn of Dred Scott decisions infamous forever. We recast the ideas of a people. We wrote new charters of liberty-giving freedom, citizenship, and the ballot to millions of a despised and oppressed race. By this republican usurpation the slave power was smitten as with the wrath of God.

> Its once strong arms hang nerveless evermore;
> * * * *
> And they who ruled in its imperial name,
> Subdued, stand sullenly apart
> And scowl at the hands that overthrew its reign
> And shattered at a blow the prisoner's chain.

I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, to answer this assault on the republican party further. It needs no defense. It does not shrink from its record or cry for quarter when it is attacked. Its courage, its patriotism, and its statesmanship have been tested. The eighteen years of its power were crowded full with fearful responsibilities. As it struggled along through these years with a formidable foe in its front and marplots and conspirators in its rear, it may have sometimes blundered in its work; but it met unblanched the shock and agony of a gigantic civil war, and in the midst of the unutterable woe of that ghastly conflict it never for a moment wavered in its devotion to human liberty or to the Union of the States. In that day of gloom and foreboding it maintained an undying faith in the ultimate triumph of the Government, and the complete restoration of constitutional liberty. When the war was over it gathered tenderly up the fragments of the nation, broken under the cannon-wheels of war, and rebound them into a more perfect and glorious Union. It has made liberty the corner-stone of a restored republic. With the British poet we may now say:

> Slaves cannot breathe in our land; if their lungs
> Receive our air, that moment they are free;
> They touch our country, and their shackles fall.
> That's noble, and speaks a nation proud and jealous of a blessing.

And look at our financial record. The waste and extravagance of war left us a dishonored credit and a prostrate currency. An onerous public debt burdened the people and a relentless taxation oppressed them. An abundant currency stimulated a reckless spirit of speculation, and improvident investments resulted in bankruptcies and financial ruin. With the crash came stagnation of business and suffering and want. Hunger sat at our hearth-stones. Malcontents advocated open repudiation. In this period of depression and panic the wildest financial heresies had rapid growth, and there was uncertainty and alarm all over the country. Here, again, sir, republican statesmanship was equal to the great crisis. It grasped the situation, and by a wise economy and prudent management put our national credit alongside that of the most favored people of the world. It has brought our discredited and depreciated currency up to a par with coin. Our despised greenback is equal to gold in London or in Paris.

We have reduced our annual interest rate and largely diminished taxation. We have restored public confidence, and see once more the unmistakable signs of a coming prosperity that will cheer the hearts of the despondent and bring a harvest of blessings to all our people. We laid our financial system on a foundation so solid that it will withstand the assaults of all comers. We have accomplished these results amid the hisses and reproaches of a most appalling opposition. But the republican party did not falter on its way. It marched right on, until it attained the grand results for which it struggled. It has supplemented its victory in war by its achievements in peace, and it cheerfully submits its work and its record to the judgment of a patriotic people. And in this contest, this great struggle of parties, we stand by the liberty that survived the battle and the laws made for its protection. We resist this attack on the laws in the interest of a common country and to secure to the people the most perfect fairness and freedom in our national elections. We do not fear the amplest freedom, but we dread even the shadow of oppression; we do not fear law, but we dread anarchy and misrule. It is said the Greeks put over the gates of the temple at Delphi these words: Liberty, law, peace. I would make these the trinity of a reunited and regenerated republic. When the nation puts liberty, the freedom of thought, of speech, and of the ballot under the guardianship of law, then peace will come; and it will not be one of bayonets, "smelling rank of rotting liberties," but a peace unintimidated, unawed, uncoerced, overshadowing alike with its white wings the lowly cabins of the poor and the turreted and gilded palaces of the rich. Then, sir, under the auspices of that peace that law and liberty secures, democratic institutions will be safe, and we may hope, whatever the fate of administrations or political parties, the Republic, charged with the destiny of a free people, will endure through the ages.

Mr. DEUSTER. Mr. Chairman, after due consideration and reflection I have come to look upon the repeal of this law as an absolute necessity, demanded alike by reasons of justice and policy. My objections to it are not of a political nature, but none the less deserving of the most careful attention and approval of all who believe in equality before the law and have preserved a due respect for the fundamental principles of our republican institutions. One cannot point to a more striking contrast, a greater variance, between the alleged objects of the law and its practical consequences, between the avowed purpose of any measure and its real results, than this law presents. Enacted, as its very title claims, "to enforce the rights of citizens of the United States to vote," this very law has served as a cloak for disfranchising a large class of voters by the very officers to whom its faithful execution has been intrusted.

ENFORCEMENT WITH A VENGEANCE.

There has never been a greater conflict between the declared intention of a law and the facts resulting from its execution; there could be no wider, astonishing discrepancy between word and deed than is presented to us by the practical workings, the appliance of this law and its effects upon naturalized citizens in the largest city of the Union during the past seven years. No fair-minded, impartial observer can fail to look with surprise and justifiable apprehension upon the arbitrary, excessive, and unconstitutional powers which officers of the Government appointed under this law have arrogated to themselves. Instead of protecting the citizen, officers of election, who owe their official existence to the enactment of this law, deprived thousands of inoffensive citizens of the documentary evidence of their citizenship under threats of criminal prosecution, and thus rendered worthless to them the boon of citizenship, conferred upon them in legal form by the courts of their State and accepted by them in good faith, with all its obligations as well as all the privileges implied in the act of naturalization.

I do not hesitate to brand this unprecedented assault upon the rights of the naturalized citizen, as committed by the chief supervisor of elections in New York upon legal voters of that city, as one of the greatest outrages ever planned and executed in this country under cover of law! Such an unblushing violation of a most important provision of our fundamental law, which grants security against unreasonable seizures to the persons and papers of our citizens, should not be permitted to escape the severest censure, and I would be derelict in my duty to the people who sent me here did I fail to characterize these high-handed proceedings as the crowning infamy of any ever perpetrated under pretext of law!

No better proof is needed of the necessity of repealing or essentially modifying this law than the tyrannical authority assumed by that officer under the interpretation he chose to give it. A law liable to such an unjust, illiberal, and oppressive interpretation, and capable of leading to such flagrant violations of universally recognized fundamental principles of equality and justice, should at once be stricken from the statute-book and consigned to oblivion. A law that can furnish the pretext for the wholesale arrest and imprisonment of inoffensive citizens, not one of whom is afterward convicted of any offense, must condemn itself in the opinion of every unprejudiced mind.

PLAYING THE MISCHIEF WITH THE SACRED RIGHTS OF NATURALIZED CITIZENS.

It is a matter of utter indifference whether the East or the West, the North or the South has furnished the scene for such disgraceful acts. The naturalized citizen must be safe and must feel protected in the exercise of all the privileges of citizenship in New York as well as in San Francisco, in Milwaukee as well as in New Orleans; and the occurrence of such outrages as those enacted in the city of New York is none the less to be discountenanced and their recurrence guarded against than if the victims had resided in any other part of the country. In fact these proceedings, as I shall directly show, have not only already affected the rights of the naturalized citizen all over the country, but may even affect them beyond the limits of our national domain.

They furnish a remarkable instance of the unforeseen extent to which any arbitrary exercise of power may lead at any time, and of the intricate questions likely to arise when such arbitrary powers are once conferred or implied. They will lie dormant only until, in the natural course of events, they lead to such abuses as we have witnessed in New York. A most dangerous precedent was thus created by the mere assumption of an election officer; for whence could such an official derive his authority to declare judicial documents, which are valid on their face, to be fraudulent, and prosecute their holders, before he had fully satisfied himself, by due process of law, that an offense was committed? Not in a single instance had the charge of forgery been preferred, and if the judges or clerks of the courts which issued the documents have ever been indicted for any offense I have not heard of it.

The dangers consequent upon any such law which loosely grants powers or implies what arbitrary powers or authority minor officers of the Government may arrogate to themselves under cover of it would alone be sufficient to condemn it as being in conflict with the spirit of our republican institutions, and would justify its repeal. I am well aware of the claims made that the courts whose decrees were thus set at defiance and whose judicial power was thus contemptuously ignored had not complied with the laws governing the act of naturalization; but I contend that such objections to judicial proceedings or doubts in the legality of documents issued thereunder must be argued in due form of law before the courts, and that any attempt to make the holder of such official decrees suffer for such doubts, without previous judicial inquiries, must be denounced as a high-handed, unwarrantable, and unjustifiable proceeding.

Whenever the principle of individual rights, as secured by constitutional guarantees, is surrendered to measures of temporary emergency or for party advantage, no matter how well meant such measures might be, then there is no telling where the encroachment upon those rights will stop!

A NEW WAY OF DISPENSING JUSTICE.

To question the validity of naturalization papers issued by State courts in proper form and under their seal, not by proceedings in court to set them aside, but by arresting the citizen possessing such a paper and compelling him to prove his innocence of any fraud in obtaining it, or its validity as a judicial document, is so novel a method in our administration of justice that I am in charity disposed to believe that the officers who assumed the authority for introducing such innovations would have shrunk from the responsibility attendant upon their remarkable action had they been fully cognizant of its logical consequences.

Under this new dispensation of justice we were compelled to witness in New York the singular spectacle of an officer, backed by the authority of the United States, demanding and obtaining the surrender of certificates of naturalization on the part of citizens who had complied, so far as they could, with the law under which they were entitled to them—not because any court had decided these certificates to be illegal and void, but because this presumptuous officer took it for granted that they were not properly obtained, and because he was vested with sufficient authority to give these citizens of New York the full benefit of his opinion!

If it were not for the grounds afforded by this law, which would cover almost anything done by election officers under its provisions, I should be at a loss to harmonize such strange doings with what has heretofore been considered good law upon the subject of certificates of naturalization and the rights acquired under them. I could step into the ranks of the very advocates and administrators of the law as it now stands for my authority in asserting that these doings in New York are in striking contrast with the decisions of the best authorities upon the laws of naturalization and election. From the mass of opinions of prominent writers upon this subject I will quote but one excellent authority, Hon. George W. McCrary, now Secretary of War, who, in his Treatise on the American Law of Elections, has this to say upon the subject:

> A certificate of naturalization in due form, issued by a court possessing the jurisdiction to grant the same, is prima facie evidence of naturalization, and an election officer cannot go behind it. If a voter could be obliged to bring proof aliunde to sustain such a certificate, and the judges of election could be obliged to hear evidence pro and con, the value of the boon of citizenship which we confer upon foreigners who come to our shores would be greatly lessened. Besides, in many localities where the number of naturalized voters is very large this mode of proceeding would be impossible, since a few cases would consume the whole of the day of election, and many would remain unheard. (Commonwealth vs. Lee, 1 Brewster, 273. Ib. vs. Sheritt, ibid., 183; Ib. vs. Leary, ibid., 270.)

When this plain statement of a self-evident, logical conclusion is compared with the remarkable spectacle afforded by the doings of an election officer in New York charged with the execution of a law entitled, as if in mockery of justice, "An act to enforce the right of citizens of the United States to vote," and who, in enforcing this very law, drags thousands of naturalized citizens, legal voters, away from the polls and subjects them to imprisonment, legal proceedings, and many other annoyances, merely upon the strength of an assumption that the documentary evidence of their citizenship, produced by them in due form, might be contestable, one cannot fail to become impressed with the conviction that either the law itself which sanctions such proceedings is unjust and oppressive, or that its execution is intrusted to improper hands, or that both are at fault.

A COMMON SENSE DECISION BY A UNITED STATES COURT, AND HOW IT IS COMPLIED WITH.

In deciding upon one of the cases brought before him under this remarkable administration of the election laws, (United States circuit court,) Judge Blatchford, of New York, felt constrained to say:

It is hardly to be supposed that Congress intended to make the applicant for citizenship responsible for a non-compliance with any other conditions than such as he had the power to comply with. The applicant can declare his intention, and can take the prescribed oath, and make the prescribed renunciation; but he cannot see to it that the proceedings and renunciation are recorded. He can produce a witness as to his residence and character, and can appear in person in the proper court and be sworn there in open court, with his witness, as to the matter prescribed in the statute. When this is done he can do nothing more than to receive such certificate from the court as that which Coleman (the defendant) received from the court, a certificate which sets forth that it is given by the court under its seal.

Yet notwithstanding this sensible decision, the same arbitrary course toward the naturalized citizen is still pursued there under this law. I maintain that it is unwise and impolitic as well as unjust to the naturalized citizen to perpetuate a law upon the statute-book that furnished the pretext for establishing a dangerous precedent for foreign nations to question the validity of naturalization papers issued to their former subjects. For what recognition, I ask, can we reasonably expect of them for American certificates of naturalization, if United States officials at home may refuse to accept them as prima facie evidence of the rights of citizenship acquired by the persons to whom they were issued by the courts?

EX-SECRETARY OF STATE HAMILTON FISH KNEW BETTER.

Such international questions may spring up at any moment, and this virtual disfranchisement of naturalized citizens in New York by an officer of the United States Government may prove a dangerous weapon against us whenever an occasion should arise compelling our Government to recognize the principle of upholding the legality of such certificates of naturalization. That the Government is well aware of its true position under such circumstances, is best shown by a correspondence which passed between the German embassador, Baron Schloezer, and the Secretary of State, Mr. Fish, in reference to the case of two brothers, Jacob and Herman Kastellan, former Prussian subjects, who left their native country in May, 1866, and June, 1867, respectively, and returned to Prussia in 1871, after having been naturalized in the early part of that year. It was thus evident that they could not have complied with the requirements of the naturalization laws as to prior residence, and on December 31, 1874, the German embassador, transmitting these naturalization papers to our Department of State, requested information upon the following points:

First, whether these papers were valid under the laws of the United States; and,

Second, whether the Government of the United States recognized the Messrs. Kastellan upon these certificates of naturalization as American citizens.

On January 8, 1875, the Department of State forwarded the following reply to Baron Schloezer, (see Foreign Rel., 1875, Pt. I, No. 252:)

Mr. Fish to Mr. Schloezer.

No. 252.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 8, 1875.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 31st ultimo, inclosing, sub petitione remissionis, the certificates of naturalization as citizens of the United States of Jacob Kastellan and Herman Kastellan, former subjects of Prussia.

The certificates bear date, respectively, the 12th of January and the 13th of February, 1871, and your note conveys the information that in the same year, 1871, the Messrs. Kastellan returned to Prussia and settled at Koshmin, in the province of Posen, their native place.

It appears, also, that after the return of the brothers Kastellan to Koshmin, certain inquiries were instituted by the local authorities of that place in relation to their citizenship, and that in response to the inquiries Jacob Kastellan stated that he received his discharge as a Prussian citizen from the government of Posen in 1866, and left for the United States in the month of May of that year; that Herman declared that he received his discharge from the same authority in 1867, and that he left for the United States in the same year; and you further state that official inquiry made at the government of Posen verified the correctness of these statements as to the date of the respective discharges, Jacob Kastellan having, as it is alleged, received his on the 20th of February, 1866, and that of Herman having been granted on the 6th of May, 1867.

These subsequent statements and facts appearing to be incompatible with the declaration of the certificates to the effect that each of the parties in question had resided in the United States five years previous to his naturalization, you desire to be informed, first, whether the certificates are valid before the laws of the United States; and, second, whether on the strength of these documents Jacob and Herman Kastellan are recognized by this government as American citizens.

These inquiries involve a question of the gravest judicial character. The two papers which I had the honor to receive with your note are certificates of regular decrees purporting to have been rendered by courts of general jurisdiction, and are accompanied with the ordinary evidence recognized by the laws of the United States as attesting the genuineness of solemn documents emanating from such tribunals; they are received as verities in all other courts of the United States and of the several States, and accepted with like credit by the executive branch of the Government.

It appears, moreover, that these certificates expressly state that the fact of the required previous residence was proved to the satisfaction of the court; and it will be remembered that the law requires proof to be furnished in such cases by the oath of the party and other sworn testimony in corroboration thereof.

What the precise evidence submitted in the case under consideration may have been this Department is not informed, but the presumption of correctness and regularity which obtains in relation to proceedings in judicial tribunals, under the laws of the United States, is equally applicable to naturalization proceedings and applies to them with full force.

By the decree, therefore, of a competent court, after a hearing upon sworn testimony, and with the parties before the court, it has been adjudged that these applicants for citizenship had complied with the law as to residence and otherwise, and that they were legally admitted to citizenship. Such an adjudication affects the rights and property of individuals and their children, and may seriously affect a change in the rights and interest of third parties. To assume to question the legality or binding force of such a decree upon statements afterward made by the parties or obtained from other sources, would practically amount to the annulling of such decree affecting all these classes of persons upon statements not under oath, taken ex parte, and without a hearing on the question.

If the political department of the Government may from time to time pass upon such questions according to the apparent credibility of the particular evidence offered to impeach the decree or the varying statement of an interested party, no uniformity of decision or security for acquired rights could exist.

In view of all these considerations, I have the honor to inform you that under the circumstances and in the case you state certificates of naturalization, valid on their face and founded on the decree of a competent court, cannot be questioned except through judicial proceedings instituted for the purpose, or in which the correctness of the facts formerly passed upon may properly be adjudicated, and that it is not within the province of the political department of the Government to anticipate what would be the result of a judicial inquiry into the question.

In pursuance of your request I have the honor to return herewith the two certificates in question.

Accept, &c.,

HAMILTON FISH.

VALID ON ITS FACE FOR EVERYBODY—EXCEPT THE SUPERVISOR OF ELECTIONS.

No more distinct recognition of its duty under such circumstances could be asked of the Government. Here we have an instance where the certificates of naturalization bore the plain mark of fraud upon their very face, and yet the Government hastened to promptly notify the representative of a foreign government that their holders must be recognized as entitled to American citizenship! And why were they so recognized? Because, says Mr. Fish, "certificates of naturalization, valid on their face, and founded on the decree of a competent court, cannot be questioned except through judicial proceedings." And then he goes on to tell the representative of a foreign government, in explanation of the constitutional powers of the various branches of our Government, that "it is not within the province of the political department of the Government to anticipate what would be the result of a judicial inquiry."

Compare this lofty declaration which proclaims as sacred and inviolable the decree of a court granted a naturalized citizen under circumstances, even, which cast the dark shadow of doubt upon his claims to citizenship, with the summary and arbitrary nullification and confiscation of certificates of naturalization, and the wholesale arrest, imprisonment, and tyrannical treatment of their holders, citizens of New York, by an officer of the Government—not upon the judgment of a court against them, but because this arbitrary officer believed himself authorized, under this very law, to substitute his opinion as to the legality of these papers for the judicial inquiry usually necessary before the validity of the decree of a court can be questioned. If officers of our own Government are permitted to arrogate to themselves, under the provisions of this law, the power to determine how far they may recognize or deny the claims to citizenship of a naturalized citizen, how can we insist upon a due recognition of these claims by foreign governments, if any of our naturalized citizens happen to be within their jurisdiction? How can we extend our boasted protection to an American citizen in any part of the world, if we discriminate against any class of them at home? And how can we demand that the decisions of American judicial tribunals be respected at home or abroad, if government officials may set such a dangerous example of a flagrant violation of their sanctity?

ITS INJUSTICE FELT AT THE TIME OF THE PASSAGE OF THE LAW.

I can understand and appreciate the motives which prompt the gentlemen who now so gallantly defend this law, but I should like to call their attention to the fact that some of them, then members of the Congress which passed this law, felt conscientious scruples as to its constitutionality, justice, and fairness. There was a feeling of insecurity, an apprehension of certain unforeseen and undefined dangers which lurked about this measure, principally on account of the extensive powers vested in minor officers. Among those who most plainly expressed this feeling of insecurity as to the logical results of the passage of this law was the distinguished Senator from Illinois, then a member of this House, Hon. JOHN A. LOGAN. During the debate upon this law he raised the point "whether a soldier, who, if called upon to assist a United States marshal in making arrests at an election, should kill anybody in the discharge of his duty, would be subject to civil or military jurisdiction," and declared that unless he could be satisfied upon this point he could not vote for the bill. The gentleman's conscientious scruples seem to have quieted down very soon, however, for we find him afterward among those voting "ay" upon the question of the passage of the bill.

Such instances were quite numerous, and foreshadowings of complicated questions, problems of an intricate nature and difficult of solution, will always follow in the wake like the punishment overtaking the offender whenever in disregard of the well-defined lines of constitutional authority powers are assumed which were not legally vested in the usurper, or rights abridged which cannot be questioned except by due process of law.

When I examine the creditable record made by some of these distinguished gentlemen in their defense against what they then considered a dangerous encroachment upon popular rights, I can only admire the courage and ingenuity with which they now maintain their position upon the other side, after finding from subsequent developments and the history of this law since its enactment the worst fears realized which they then entertained.

It is immaterial whether the remarkable proceedings in New York are directly traceable to the distinct provisions of this law, or whether the officer charged with its execution exercised an authority not anticipated in creating his office. It is sufficient to justify its repeal that it failed to restrict him within proper and reasonable limits in the exercise of his functions, and also failed to define the authority to which this officer, vested with such extraordinary powers, should be directly responsible and answerable for his conduct or the faithful discharge of his duties. A law susceptible of such willful interpretation and unlimited "stretching" is too dangerous to public safety and popular liberty to remain upon the statute-book.

HOW DAVENPORT WAS ENCOURAGED BY THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Besides, I have been unable to learn of any efforts made or measures taken to hold that officer accountable for his actions toward inoffensive citizens of foreign birth or to restrict him somewhat in the unlimited exercise of this self-created authority. For aught I know to the contrary, there may be an election held in the city of New York to-morrow and Mr. Davenport may repeat his outrages upon legal voters again and again with the same impunity with which he has proceeded heretofore. So far from being obstructed in his assaults upon the people, he did not even receive a friendly warning such as was given to others. It will be found by reference to the report of the Committee on the Judiciary to the Forty-fifth Congress (see Report 135, Forty-fifth Congress, third session) upon the charges against Mr. Davenport investigated by it, that the Attorney-General of the United States, perhaps somewhat alarmed at the summary proceedings of that officer, over whom he could only claim a "supervisory" authority so far as the cost of this expensive luxury is concerned, thought it proper to officially "advise" the United States district attorney at New York, who acted in concert with Mr. Davenport, not to proceed too indiscriminately, and, to use his own words, "not to take any steps which could not be successfully sustained before the courts."

In the same letter, however, dated July 31, 1878, the honorable Attorney-General thus encourages his subordinate, the district attorney, and indirectly, through the latter, his associate, Mr. Davenport: "I do not anticipate," he says, "that you will find any difficulty in bringing to justice a sufficient number of offenders!" This is the fullest extent of any official reprimand or censure which I am able to find upon record as having been received by Mr. Davenport, directly or indirectly, from those high in authority for his questionable proceedings. Offenders, forsooth! I should like to ask the honorable Attorney-General upon what principle in law, equity, or justice he bases his opinion that the citizens voting upon the strength of certificates of naturalization obtained years ago in good faith, and issued to them by the courts of their respective States in due form and under the seal of such courts, were or had become offenders before the law? I should like to inquire according to what process of reasoning or logical deduction the possession of a judicial document, the genuineness of which can only be questioned before the courts, constitutes an offense in the eyes of the honorable gentleman who presides over the Department of Justice?

Mr. Davenport's full and undisputed sway over the election machinery in New York provided by the Government in pursuance of this law enacted in order "to enforce the rights of citizens of the United States to vote" is sufficiently attested to require no further illustration or comment. But a still more remarkable proof of the manner in which his illegal proceedings were countenanced by the Department of Justice is furnished by the following correspondence between the United States district attorney at New York, who acted in concert with Mr. Davenport, and the honorable Attorney-General, as I find it in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, already referred to, (see Report 135, Forty-fifth Congress, third session:)

A REMARKABLE DISPLAY OF IGNORANCE BY A LEGAL LUMEN, AND HOW THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL KNEW NO BETTER.

OFFICE OF THE UNITED STATES ATTORNEY, FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK,
New York, August 21, 1878.

SIR: In reply to your letter of 31st July, 1878, I furnished a copy of the same to Commissioner Davenport. Yesterday he writes me asking what action I purpose taking respecting the complaints on file in his office charging fraudulent registrations and the possession of fraudulent certificates of naturalization.

He states in such letter that there are now about eighty-five hundred such complaints filed with him, and that he is informed the number may be increased about fifteen hundred.

I have to-day written him that unless his experience as chief supervisor of elections suggests a different course I will publish a card stating the information received from him, and requesting all persons holding such certificates to surrender them to him before the 10th of September proximo.

I do not propose to proceed further against parties who shall avail themselves of this privilege of voluntary surrender. On and after September 10 I will, as fast as the force at my command shall permit, examine the complaints against parties not surrendering their fraudulent certificates, and will then endeavor to select a number of the worst cases and press them to trial.

I trust that this action will accord with the suggestions contained in your letter of July 9, 1878, on this subject, and will meet your approval. I suppose that this action may logically lead to the approval of the commissioner's accounts for receiving the several complaints and administering the oath thereon. This would be less than $1 on each complaint. I don't see how I can in any other manner intelligently discriminate between the many parties against whom the supervisor has felt it his duty to receive complaints. Inclosed please find copies of Mr. Davenport's letter to me dated yesterday, and my reply thereto dated to-day.

Very respectfully, yours,

STEWART L. WOODFORD,
United States Attorney.

Hon. CHARLES DEVENS, Attorney-General.

To which the Attorney-General replied as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, August 31, 1878.

SIR: I have read your letter to me of the 24th instant, in which you state the course which has been determined upon in relation to the parties charged with holding fraudulent naturalization certificates, and I desire to say that the same meets my full approval.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. DEVENS,
Attorney-General.

STEWART L. WOODFORD, Esq.,
United States Attorney, New York, N. Y.

The United States district attorney at New York, thus, in plain words and with the expressed approbation of the Department of Justice, tells a large number of naturalized citizens that he intends to examine into the validity and incontestable nature of their certificates of naturalization, but that before doing so he will kindly grant them a respite, in order that they may voluntarily come forward and —surrender them! Surrender the evidence of their citizenship acquired in good faith! The same evidence of citizenship which four years ago the dignified head of the Department of State declared himself ready to uphold and defend against any foreign nation, if necessary, with all the power of the United States!

The United States district attorney at New York, that legal lumen, neglected to state whether he also had the authority, real or assumed, to absolve those "offenders" from all obligations as citizens under certain emergencies.

When the most singular theory of this United States district attorney and his superior, the honorable Attorney-General—that a citizen is an offender before the law until he proves his innocence to the satisfaction of his prosecutor—is contrasted with our modern ideas of justice and the law upon this particular subject of naturalization, as expounded and interpreted so clearly in the excellent treatise of that distinguished associate of the honorable Attorney-General in the Cabinet, the Secretary of War, one cannot help thinking that better law and justice prevail to-day at our War Department than at our Department of Justice.

Remembering how under cover of this law such a wholesale disfranchisement of legal voters could occur—and instead of restitution being made or attempted the parties guilty of such a flagrant violation of the sacred rights of citizens were upheld and countenanced by the judicial department of this administration—it seems as if a prophetic spirit had prompted one of my predecessors in this House from the State of Wisconsin, Mr. Eldredge, while he antagonized this measure at the time of its enactment, to say—

> It bears on its face, and in all its provisions the clearest evidence of its origin and purpose, not to secure, but to prevent pure and fair elections; not to aid the voter to express his own unbiased judgment, but to awe him into submission, and control him against his conviction. Its very title is a false pretense, if not a lie, adopted for the purpose of defrauding the people and cheating them into the support of a most infamous measure. * * * No sane man can believe that this is a bill to enforce the rights of citizens of the United States to vote. It must be seen that it is a bill to prevent, hinder, and delay citizens in voting. It provides a system to drive citizens from the polls, and to disgust all honest men with our elections.

EQUAL JUSTICE TO ALL—TO THE NATURALIZED CITIZEN AS WELL AS THE NEGRO.

I am well aware that some such expedient as this measure has been claimed to be necessary to maintain the political rights of the "nation's ward," and more particularly the colored citizen of the South. How far the rights of colored voters were denied or encroached upon by political opponents in the South I must leave to others to discuss; I can only say that it appears to me neither just nor advisable, nor in accord with our ideas of popular liberty and good legislation, to concentrate such dangerous powers in the hands of irresponsible officers, and to curtail the rights of one large class of citizens in order to confer a questionable benefit upon another class. Again, so far as my knowledge extends, the Federal courts had neither at the time of the enactment of this measure nor since then ever suspended the administration of the law for one moment; and if the colored voters were unlawfully interfered with, they could apply the same remedy in protecting their rights to which the citizen of the North must resort when his privileges as such are endangered. There can be no good reasons for "protecting" by any special law or forcible measure any class of citizens of the South, or anywhere else, so long as the Federal courts are open to them and so long as behind these courts stands the whole power of the United States to enforce their mandates and assert the majesty of the law; nor can there be any good reason for the continuation of a measure which only tends to bring these very courts into disrepute and contempt—for throwing the cloak of judicial sanction around acts as unjustifiable, discreditable, and lawless as those we have witnessed in the city of New York. I am unwilling to believe that these questionable operations against naturalized citizens on account of the pretended dubious legality of their certificates of naturalization could have been based upon the detestable theory that the naturalized citizen is less entitled to the fullest protection of the law than he who is to the "manner born," or the colored citizen who has become the "ward of the nation." If such a theory has been entertained but for a moment, then all those directly or indirectly connected with this outrage deserve to be relegated to the obscurity of private life, with the stigma of lasting infamy upon their names. Such mistaken notions cannot be cured too soon or too radically wherever and whenever they appear upon the surface of public life to modify or practically nullify our equality before the law. Any deviation from this course antagonizes the liberal spirit of our institutions and renders worthless the protection promised and inducements offered the foreigner who assumes, with its privileges, also the obligations of American citizenship and tends to turn the tide of immigration from our shores, instead of fostering and encouraging it. As a nation we are not isolated in the appreciation of the influx of capital, the increase of numerical strength and power of development of natural resources which attend immigration.

The liberality of our naturalization laws is equaled, and in a few instances even surpassed, by some other countries. Austria, Prussia, Russia, Belgium, and Holland require no prior residence of the foreigner who swears them allegiance. In Würtemberg the purchase of real estate constitutes the purchaser a citizen. France requires but three years' prior residence, and but one even, in the case of distinguished persons, talented and skilled artists, manufacturers and artisans. Brazil also requires but three years; Portugal, Greece, and Mexico two; Denmark, Peru, and other countries but one year's prior residence.

THE SUPERVISOR MUST GO—WE WILL FEED HIM NO LONGER.

One word more. A great deal is being said about the manner in which the repeal or modification of this obnoxious measure is sought to be attained. But while a separate, distinct enactment for this purpose may be impartially considered by the executive branch of the Government, and might receive its sanction, the necessity for this repeal or modification is apparently so great, the injustice of its further continuance so patent, that it would not seem advisable to endanger the result by the merest probability that political considerations could prevent its approval by the Executive. It is a case where the ends justly sanctify the means. We cannot imply an indirect assent to the perpetuation of this law by granting the money required to carry out its provisions. We can justly decline to appropriate money for a purpose which we hold to be unconstitutional, unjust, and oppressive, and if the other business of the Government is thereby retarded the blame must rest with those who insist upon retaining this unjust law upon our statute-book.

While I admire the brilliant forensic talent which has been displayed on both sides during our debates, I have been puzzled to understand what good effect upon the general welfare of the country these reminiscences of the war and sectional disputes can be expected to exercise. As I said in the beginning, I have no such arguments to offer, no political grounds to bring forward. I plead only for equal rights and equal justice to all. I can only say that no party can live that cannot afford to be just, and that after all the people themselves are the component parts of all parties. Let us, above all, be just to them, even to the most humble portion of them, and thereby demonstrate that while we may differ as to the ways our common object always will be the same, that of the welfare and prosperity of this great nation.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Chairman, we have passed through the ordeal of a most exciting debate upon the Army appropriation bill, the spirit of which cannot, I think, be commended save as it may be viewed from the most ultra-partisan stand-point. I had hoped that in the present discussion gentlemen might see the propriety suggested by a high order of patriotism of viewing the issues presented in the bill under consideration as Americans, citizens of a great country, having a common destiny, cherishing a profound respect for its beneficent institutions, and earnestly laboring to still further perfect and perpetuate them. Much has been said of the prerogative of the States, and infringements upon their rights forcibly and eloquently deprecated—all of which is wise and proper, inasmuch as the functions of government in each separate Commonwealth are important and not to be ignored. All sovereignty legitimately attached to them should of right be recognized, for they compose our glorious Union, whose stability and authority are most desirable, whose life is endeared to the good men of all parties who revere their Government and are not less sensitive to the nation's requirements and its duties than they are to the rights of the States.

This admitted, and I think there are few, if any, who will question the truth of the proposition, a solemn duty rests with us to secure to every individual invested with the proud insignia of citizenship immunity from interference or intimidation, whether these attacks are to be resisted in Pennsylvania or New York, Massachusetts or South Carolina.

I know, sir, that good, sincere men, who pray for peace and harmony throughout our country, feel that we should remit this whole matter to the people themselves; that they are responsible for the injustice and violence complained of, and they can, if they will, purify the politics of the nation and banish the thugs whose infamies on election day are a reproach and disgrace to the age. I wish it were possible to reduce this theory to practice; it would be much more in accord with the spirit of our institutions; but, sir, all such attempts, I fear, will prove but as the dreams of the idealist until the demagogue shall have been excluded from caucus and convention and the patriot be recognized as the true exponent of the people's will.

When a new order of things shall have been reached, the millennium proclaimed and accepted, authority may be dispensed with, as antagonisms and interests of a selfish and ignoble character will have disappeared. I submit that repression of the most criminal character affecting the freedom of elections, invading the sacred precincts of a free franchise and designed to strike down the manhood of the country, degrading the people to a condition of helotism, cannot be doubted if we accept as true the statement of the republicans as to the number and character of outrages in the Southern States more in accord with the barbarism of Patagonia than the civilization of any State of this Republic. Nor is the picture less repulsive, less hideous or more assuring, when, sketched by the democratic artist in its somber shading, is portrayed similar crimes; and the charges are directly and positively made, deliberately preferred, that fraud, treachery, the most vile political and mercenary appliances, are sought to be effectively used by the opposite party to stamp out overwhelming democratic majorities. Where there is so much smoke there must be some fire; for, sir, it would be derogatory to the character of the prominent gentlemen of both parties to this controversy, indulging in these severe charges and counter-charges, to assume they are made to order, manufactured merely for political effect.

Mr. Chairman, I look upon these developments as being of the most serious character, boding but little promise of hope for the future of our country, freighted with consequences that may eventuate in the destruction of civil liberty in America.

The mere assertion that frauds were perpetrated, the bare suspicion that any party in our political life is base enough to meditate such a revolting crime, so impious as to place its sacrilegious hands upon this ark of the covenant of American liberty, should excite the condemnation and unsparing censure of men yet free whose first duty is to country, not party, who, when its life is endangered, its integrity assailed, its authority questioned, accept the great responsibility of stepping to the front in its defense, whose mission it is to preserve the rarest jewel of earth, this Republic, that its brilliancy may challenge the admiration of the less fortunate of other lands subjected to the unfeeling domination of despots.

It is, sir, a grave question agitating the minds of many good and true men to-day whether this nation can exist and that full measure of liberty be secured to the people so fondly cherished by the patriotic founders of our Government unless a more scrupulous regard for the rights of all and a higher and purer estimate be placed upon the purity of the ballot-box.

It is quite common in these latter days to hear utterances that to some seem strangely out of place, sentiments thoroughly at variance with that good, old-fashioned doctrine that the voice of the people is the voice of God in the political order, a truth that should ever inspire the humblest in the land with a lofty patriotism, an idea that invests the toiler unless convicted of crime with the proud decoration of citizenship, the franchise of which should not be coerced or enfeebled by the stratagems of professional politicians. Strange and impossible as it may seem, the advance guard of "special privilege" is occasionally heard in this fair land; its bugle blast sounds "down with manhood suffrage;" the wisdom of the fathers is doubted, their simplicity pitied, and men of some pretension and culture, if not eminence, are found advocating restrictions and qualifications whose imposition is intended to disfranchise the many and erect upon the ruins of political equality an intolerable, soul-abhorring aristocracy. Against this treason now somewhat popular, this innovation wholly un-American, I desire to enter my humble protest; imbued with that feeling, impelled by that motive, I do not hesitate to declare upon this floor that I believe any measure, whether intended or not to impair the efficiency of supervisors of election, that denies to them proper facilities to alike prevent illegal voting and all attempts at the intimidation of citizens legally entitled to vote, is a very grave mistake and should not be entered upon in obedience to the whims and caprices of partisan interest and necessity.

Gentlemen can best serve their country by placing safeguards around the ballot-box that will tend to purify the approaches to this sanctuary of the people; they will thus fortify with renewed hope the devotees of free government who yet hesitate to admit that we are incapable of the exercise of sufficient virtue to preserve intact and perpetuate the priceless heritage of popular government. Mr. Chairman, I suppose it is claimed that any interference such as I believe to be necessary upon the part of the Federal Government is unconstitutional, arbitrary, and dangerous to the independence of the several States. Whether we have sufficient reason to dread the exercise of this power I will not discuss, but this much I sincerely believe: that it should be the duty of the National Government to step in between the oppressor and the oppressed and protect the voter in all his constitutional rights independent of partisan considerations; for, sir, the stability and permanency of this Union depend upon the free and unconstrained ballot of the masses. I sincerely regret, sir, that the majority in this House did not see proper to present these repealing clauses as separate measures. For some of them I could cheerfully vote if so presented, because I am persuaded they serve while on the statute-book but to irritate the people and revive the discords and bad passions of the past.

I desire to vote for this appropriation bill, a measure of such magnitude and importance as not to be overestimated; which simply means, as I understand it, providing for the support of our governmental system. A very grave responsibility is forced upon us, and I seriously question the propriety of a policy—whether pursued by democrats or republicans, I care not—that compels us either to vote against an appropriation bill because of an objectionable feature, such as we fear is embodied in the proposed legislation, that if adopted will render wholly powerless supervisors of election, and thus leave the individual voter subject to the outrage and abuses gentlemen complain of, and a repetition of which Congress should sedulously guard against at this time. There are some gentlemen upon this floor who are willing to vote for the repeal or abolition of the jurors' test oath and provide for such modification as would secure protection and freedom to every voter by preventing excesses of partisan officials; and these measures, sir, should have been presented to us upon their merits, enabling us to assume the responsibility of voting for or against them untrammeled by the danger of defeating an appropriation bill. I trust, sir, it is not yet too late to avoid the conflict so much talked of between Congress and the President; and so trusting and believing, I hope this committee may so amend this bill as to avoid "a dead-lock" that if precipitated must prove disastrous to the whole country.

Much of the time devoted to partisan appeals could have been utilized for the enacting of measures of relief that would be hailed as a promise of a bright future for the depressed industry and discouraged labor of this nation, a duty upon our part so plain and imperative that to longer trifle with it must arouse the indignation of an outraged people. I trust this extraordinary session of the Forty-sixth Congress may wisely determine upon a policy tending to abolish the widespread want and suffering now so bitterly complained of, ameliorating the condition of the toilers whose homes are forfeited to exacting capital, whose labor is degraded, whose poverty is pronounced a crime punishable by imprisonment in some portions of our country. This spirit of relief breathed into the nation's laws would enkindle a devotion now dormant in the breasts of those tortured by pangs born of neglect, worthy of grave consideration here, and cannot be safely postponed to some future time. Promises of congressional relief do not buy bread. Some measures of a substantial character should be secured; and, sir, the sooner the better.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Chairman, I thought, when I took my seat in this House that I had some accurate ideas concerning the tenets, the faith, and the principles of the party with which I act. I thought that we had assembled here to consult as to the best methods of advancing the interests of trade, commerce, and agriculture, to devise some means to relieve the people from the burdens which oppress them, to grapple with those problems of finance, of tariff, of the relations of capital and labor, which demand for their solution all our energy, all our courage, and all our wisdom. I had concluded, sir, from my observation of political platforms promulgated almost annually since 1865, and from the opinions of the people with whom I mingled, that I might safely assume that the war was over; that its legitimate results were acquiesced in universally North and South; that the later amendments were recognized as a portion of the organic law as sacred and as binding as the rest of the Constitution; that this being the general sentiment, we had turned our backs upon the past, facing steadily to the future, with a common purpose and a common hope of accomplishing something for the common welfare.

I had nothing to do with that past, neither with precipitating the issues of the war nor with their final settlement, for I belong to a generation that has grown up to manhood and to a participation in the government of the Republic since the last shot was fired in that contest, which in my opinion so fortunately resulted in the preservation of the Union.

But I find here gentlemen on this side of the House as on that side, who were in either one or the other of those great opposing armies which for four long years made of this continent a mighty camp. I saw them stand side by side before that desk, and with hands upraised to their Creator, whose sanction they invoked, I heard them swear to support the Constitution and the laws of the United States. As I was sincere myself in that solemn act, so I gave them credit each and all of equally honest purposes.

But if I am to believe the utterances of gentlemen here, in all this I have been laboring under a gross delusion. If I am to believe the distinguished gentleman from Ohio—a leader of the other party, and an able and eloquent one—[Mr. GARFIELD,] the democracy is here to-day not for the purposes I have mentioned, not in obedience to the oath we have taken, but to reopen the book where the page was turned down in 1861 to the music of the artillery that played upon Fort Sumter. Their designs are as treasonable now as they were then, though the mode of their execution is less manly—"when they failed to shoot to death, they now undertake to starve." Led by the same confederate brigadiers, they aim a more insidious and a more deadly blow at the life of the Republic. Another distinguished gentleman, from Michigan, [Mr. BURROWS,] tells us that this is the beginning of a series of assaults, to be followed up and pushed; that lawless violence, fraud, and murder may run riot in the land. He intimates that unless we are checked in our nefarious plans it will not be long before the emancipated slaves will be paid for, the constitutional amendments abolished, slavery re-established, cotton taxes and southern claims liquidated, and the soldiers of the confederacy pensioned.

It has been loudly and persistently asserted upon this floor that the language of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] is fairly open to this interpretation. He needs not that any one should come to his defense. Panoplied with truth and animated with the ardor of honest conviction, he has shown to the satisfaction of all impartial hearers that by no forced construction can his manly words be tortured into any other meaning than such as the purest patriotism justifies.

Now, sir, if I believed for a moment one tithe of these charges, that moment would sever my connection with the democratic party. But, sir, I do not believe it and the country does not believe it. We do not purpose to open any musty tome closed in 1861 and buried forever at Appomattox. We will take up a new volume, unstained with the horrors of internecine war, and on its virgin pages we will commence to write our record—a record of harmony, peace, and goodwill, glorious with the application of imperishable principle to the ever-varying wants of the people.

I repeat, sir, that the country does not believe these charges. Over and over again for the last fifteen years they have been sown broadcast, and the answer to them has come back in a steadily decreasing republican vote, until that party has lost both branches of the Legislature, and if it retains the Executive the general voice declares it to be only through a fraud. This last relic of their former greatness, too, they are doomed soon to lose.

From an overwhelming majority a few years ago, at the last election for the members of this House they were in a minority of one million two hundred and fourteen thousand votes. A majority of nearly a million and a quarter of the people of this country have declared their want of confidence in that party which has ever turned a deaf ear to the cry of distress arising from every corner of the Republic, or tried to stifle it by the unhallowed bugle-blast calling to sectional hatred and animosity. A wise law of ancient Rome forbade the erection of any trophy in commemoration of victories won in civil strife. A majority of a million and a quarter of the American people have determined that every trophy born of the passions of war in the interest of partisan tyranny shall be expunged from the statute-book.

They will submit to nothing less, for their own rights and franchises are endangered by all laws such as those under discussion "which look to the abridgment of the liberties of the citizen." This is why gentlemen of the third party on this floor join with us in demanding this repeal. We demand it in the name of this great majority, not at the dictation of confederate brigadiers, but because every voter throughout the length and breadth of the land, from Boston to New Orleans, is threatened in the exercise of his right of suffrage—a right of higher nature than life, liberty, or property; for it is to us a buckler of defense for our lives, our liberties, and our property. These laws give to an Administration which represents but a minority of the people the power to coerce, intimidate, and defraud the majority. That the will to do so has not been wanting in the past I shall show in the course of these remarks.

In self-protection, in a patriotic spirit, recurring to the fundamental principles which underlie free government, we demand that the ballot-box be restored to that freedom which it enjoyed in the better days of the Republic, freedom from the military arm of the Federal authority as from its civil minions basely bribed from the Federal purse.

I should not, sir, trouble the House at all upon this occasion were it not that I have some personal experience with the application of those laws which we now propose to repeal. They were enforced in the district which I now have the honor to represent on this floor in the election of 1876, and their enforcement was equally obnoxious to all classes of our citizens, whatever may have been their past experiences, or whether they came from the North or the South. At present the democratic party utters the most violent complaints, but after 1880 the other side of this Chamber may resound with even louder denunciations.

The question of the repeal of these laws should therefore be considered with judicial calmness and an entire freedom from sectional or party feeling. To avoid technicalities, the sections which it is proposed to repeal are those authorizing the appointment of United States supervisors and marshals to attend at elections and the registration preceding elections for the purpose of keeping the peace and the prevention of all frauds and violence.

The supervisors are required to challenge all fraudulent voters, to personally inspect, scrutinize, and count each ballot, to make a return of their count to the chief supervisor, and to do this they are directed to enter the rooms where the ballots are kept and to take such a position with reference to the ballot-boxes as they may deem advisable. The marshals may be appointed without limit as to number, and their duties are to assist the supervisors. They have the power to arrest any one without process, before or after voting, who commits any offense in their presence against the laws of the United States.

These powers are absolute, being limited only by the discretion of those charged with their execution; and it is apparent that the ballot-box is entirely under the control of these officers and that the State officers are subordinate to them. The first question which arises is as to whether they are constitutional, and upon this I shall offer a few brief considerations. Whatever right of interference or control Congress may exercise over elections is granted by section 4 of article 1 of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Congress may then regulate the time, place, and manner of electing Representatives, and may to the same extent regulate the time and manner of the election of Senators, but has no control over the place where these latter shall be chosen.

The juxtaposition of these powers, relatively, to the election of Senators and Representatives would seem to be sufficient to demonstrate the unconstitutionality of these laws, for if they may be enacted with reference to the election of the one, why not of the other? But will any gentleman here seriously maintain that we may enact a law whereby United States supervisors and marshals may take their stations on the floor of a State Legislature, and as the members of that body cast their votes for United States Senator, may have the right to challenge them, and in case of any want of qualification, in their judgment, on the part of any member of that Legislature, may then and there arrest such a representative and drag him before a United States commissioner or judge? And yet the humblest citizen endowed with the right of suffrage by a State law holds it by as secure a title and has the same rights to its exercise as a member of the Legislature of the same State. The right is as sacred and entitled to the same protection in the one case as in the other. Both the citizen and his representative in the State Legislature hold their franchise under and by the State law.

It is not disputed that the qualifications of electors of members of this body are fixed and established by the States, when these latter indicate who shall be electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. The second section of article 1 of the Constitution guarantees this. It was never contemplated in the adoption of section 4 that any such powers should be granted to Congress as are contained in these laws. Judge Story and the Federalist, neither of whom are prone to a strict construction of Federal powers, sufficiently explain the full meaning of the words "to regulate the time, place, and manner."

They claim this power as necessary in Congress for the following reasons; I read from the second volume of Story, page 290, section 823:

> In the first place, the power may be applied by Congress to correct any negligence in a State in regard to elections, as well as to prevent a dissolution of the Government by designing and refractory States, urged on by some temporary excitement. In the next place it will operate as a check in favor of the people against any designs of a Federal Senate and their constituents to deprive the people of the State of their right to choose Representatives. In the next place it provides a remedy for the evil if any State, by reason of invasion or other causes, cannot have it in its power to appoint a place where the citizens can safely meet to choose Representatives. In the last place (as the plan is but an experiment) it may hereafter become important, with a view to the regular operations of the General Government, that there should be uniformity in the time and manner of electing Representatives and Senators so as to prevent vacancies when there may be calls for extraordinary sessions of Congress. If such a time should occur or such a uniformity be hereafter desirable, Congress is the only body possessing the means to produce it.

Such were the contingencies to provide for which this section was inserted.

Neither of these authors contemplated for a moment that the terms of this section would ever warrant the assumption of such powers as have been inserted in the statutes under consideration. They and the men of their generations were too strongly imbued with that respect for the freedom of elections and that dread of governmental interference, which is carried to such an extent in England that the most desperate election riots, resulting often in loss of life, are considered less dangerous to free institutions than the presence of a single government official at the polls.

Section 2022 of the Revised Statutes gives to any marshal the right to arrest without process, before or after voting, any person who commits or who offers to commit any offense in the presence of any of the supervisors or marshals. The chief offense herein contemplated is that of illegal voting. The marshals, therefore, by this clause, have the right to arrest without process any person whom they may consider disqualified from voting. They are not required to afford the accused any hearing, but may arbitrarily arrest him and thereby deprive him of the franchise. I maintain, sir, that this section is in violation of the fifth amendment to the Constitution, which reasserts that most important provision of the bill of rights:

> Nor shall any person be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

"The right of voting is a right in the plaintiff by the common law, and he shall maintain an action for the obstruction of it," says Lord Holt, in the case of Ashby vs. White, reported in Smith's Leading Cases. This principle has been repeatedly reaffirmed in Massachusetts, in Ohio, in Wisconsin, and in Tennessee. It is a species of property. The possessor of the franchise of course cannot part with it, cannot sell it as he may other property, but it is a right vested in him by the laws, and against any invasion of which he may invoke the laws. It is a right so sacred that, says the court, in McCafferty vs. Guyer, 59 Pa. St. Rep., 109:

> The Legislature cannot add to the constitutional qualifications of voters. One who is a qualified voter under the Constitution cannot be deprived of the elective franchise by a legislative enactment.

It will of course be conceded that the Legislature, in case of a failure by the Constitution, may regulate the times, places, and manner of voting in such a way as to ascertain and facilitate the right of voting, but they can in no wise impair or obstruct the right or add or subtract a single qualification. Registration laws have been held to be valid where they complied with principle, but the courts in sustaining them have constantly intimated that the least departure from it would render them invalid. In the case of the State vs. Staten, in 6 Coldwell, it is said:

> The elective franchise is a right which the law protects and enforces as jealously as it does property in chattels or lands. It matters not by what name it is designated, the right to vote, the elective franchise, the person who, under the constitution and laws of the State, is entitled to it, has a property in it which the law maintains and vindicates as vigorously as it does any right of any kind which men may have and enjoy. The rules of law which guard against deprivation or injury the rights of persons in corporeal properties, are alike and equally applicable to the elective franchise, and alike and equally guard persons invested with it against deprivation of or injury to it. Persons invested with it cannot be deprived of it otherwise than by due process of law.

Again, the learned judge says:

> The right of suffrage is a privilege; it is a right; one that is regarded by our race of people as more valuable than any other right with which he is invested. When clothed with the right he has a vested interest of which he cannot be deprived by any act of the Legislature. It can only be taken by due process of law or by the will of the people acting in their sovereign character.

But what is "due process of law?" It means the uniform, equal judgment of a court of some kind, free from partiality or arbitrariness. It implies a trial. Webster says:

> It is the general law which hears before it condemns, which proceeds upon inquiry, and renders judgment only after trial.

The right of franchise is conferred by the State; the United States has nothing to do with it. It may create a citizen, but it cannot make a voter. Under the second section of article 1 of the Constitution the qualification of a voter is to be fixed by the State. How, then, can it be pretended that the United States shall send its officer to the polls, there, without any trial, without any hearing, without any process of law, to deprive a voter of the right of franchise by his arbitrary judgment as to the latter's qualifications?

But, sir, even were these laws within the letter of the Constitution, they are of so dangerous a character, so liable to abuse, they operate so gross a violation of the rights of the voter, that they should not be permitted to remain a moment longer upon the statute-book which they disgrace. The experience of all history has amply demonstrated that governmental interference, whether by its civil or military officers, necessarily terminates in the destruction of the freedom of elections; that which pretends to be the shield of defense to the voter is turned into a weapon of death; the antidote by a base transmutation becomes a deadly poison. I shall show, sir, for what purposes and in what manner these laws have been applied in Saint Louis. At the election of 1876, there was but one district, that which I have the honor to represent, which was considered as assuredly democratic. Various causes, which it is needless to detail, seemed to insure a republican triumph in the other two. The democratic majority in the third was reckoned at about one thousand. There were no well grounded fears that any trouble was likely to arise. Election riots were unknown in the city and the police had always been entirely competent to keep the peace and arrest all violators of our election laws, which are extremely rigid and comprehensive. Mr. E. T. Allen, the chief supervisor appointed under these statutes, testifies in Miscellaneous House Document No. 51, page 274:

> Answer. That I am not able to state. I will say this, that as far as my duties as supervisor were concerned I had no occasion to make use of United States marshals, and saw no occasion for their use, and so expressed myself often, and am prepared to say the same thing now.

And Mr. W. D. W. Bernard, the chief deputy marshal, repeats the same opinion on page 321:

> Question. Now, in the previous elections in this city for Congressmen at which there were thirteen democrats elected to the House of Representatives, were not the elections conducted peaceably and order preserved by the police?
> Answer. So far as I know, sir; there was a little excitement at times, but those were natural with men when they get excited.

And yet, notwithstanding this, ten hundred and twenty-eight deputy marshals were appointed, of whom seven hundred and twenty-eight were located in the third district. On the face of it it is apparent that as this was the only democratic district such a distribution could only have been made with a fraudulent intent. But if there be any doubt of the fact, Mr. Bernard's candid admissions dispel the last shadow. I read from page 320:

> Question. In order to be precise I will say, independently of all party consideration, was there any more necessity for the appointment of marshals for that election than for any previous election?
> Answer. Oh, well, you gentlemen know very well that in a political struggle for party ascendency that it is necessary for the co-ordinate branches of the Government to be in accord, and there was an effort on the part, so I interpreted it, of the party which I acted with to regain control of the House of Representatives.
> Q. That party was the republican party, was it not?
> A. The republican party, sir.

Mr. Bernard considers himself and his horde of marshals as a co-ordinate branch of the Government, as they were indeed its officers but in this instance transformed into republican partisans, ready to stoop to any baseness to insure a republican success. He continues on page 321 and tells us why it had been deemed necessary to invoke these guardians of the ballots, by tens and by hundreds from the shades of private life:

Question. Was it not hoped by the republican party that upon the appointment of these marshals, from four to six districts might be carried in this State?

Answer. Well, I stated, I think, in a conversation with some political friends in Washington, that in the enforcement of that law that we could carry six. I was at Washington very frequently, perhaps six or seven times a year, and used to feel a little strange sometimes to go up to the House or Senate and not find a republican from Missouri.

Q. Did not you tell those gentlemen at Washington that if they placed that power in your hands you would guarantee them from four to six republican Congressmen from the State of Missouri?

(Objected to as irrelevant by counsel for contestee.)

A. I did not, but I told them this, that if that law was enforced in Missouri that I thought that we could. I did not say "put it in my power;" I had no thought of any active participation in the matter then.

Is it possible to doubt for a moment in the face of this evidence, that there was a conspiracy between the Administration in Washington and republican managers in Saint Louis to enforce this law, not for the purpose of keeping the peace, not for the purpose of preventing election frauds, not for the preservation of the purity of the ballot-box, but simply and solely by bribery and intimidation to secure a republican majority in the last House of Representatives, and gentlemen will remember that this is the evidence of the chief of the marshals, a kind of generalissimo of General Grant, as he is called by Mr. Allen, the chief supervisor. The following extracts, and I could give many more, but I do not desire to trespass too much on your patience, will show how this noble band was recruited:

Question. How did you come to be appointed?

Answer. I was down round the post-office a couple of days trying to get an appointment, but didn't know how those fellows worked it there, but I met a friend of mine and he told me.

(Counsel for contestee objected.)

A. Well, he fetched me to John O. Codding, and gave me an introduction to John O. Codding.

(Counsel for contestee objected to anything Codding said.)

A. Well, Codding got me put on there. He didn't have time to talk to me at first; he went down stairs. After he came back again we catched him in the hall, and this young man Barrett, who was with me, asked him about it, and he asked me who I was going to vote for for Congress, and I didn't answer. I was studying what answer to make him, and he says, "If I get you a commission," he says, "if you are in the first district I want you to vote for Ittner, and in the second to vote for Cole, in the third for Metcalfe," but I didn't make no answer. He had a commission made out for both. I believe Barrett said he would vote for Metcalfe. I didn't say anything. He handed me the commission, and handed him one. This fellow that gave me an introduction to him, a friend of mine, I don't know what his name was. I met him on the street. He says, "This fellow is a republican," and Codding says, "It don't matter if he is a democrat," he says; "so much the better, as long as you get him to vote for Congressman."

Q. Did he make that a condition, for you to vote for Congressman?

A. Yes; that I should vote for Congressman.

Q. Or else you couldn't get an appointment?

A. Or else I couldn't get an appointment.

Q. Did you have any conversation with John O. Codding before you were recommended by him?

(Contestee's counsel objects on the ground that conversations with Codding, unless he is shown to be a United States officer, have no relevancy to this case; and second, that John O. Codding is competent to testify in regard to whatever instructions he gave to this man himself.)

A. Yes; I had a conversation with him, and in that conversation he told me that I could get on provided I should vote for the Congressman. He said if I was in the first district I should vote for Ittner, and if I was in the second I should vote for Cole, and if I was in the third I should vote for Metcalfe, and the rest of the ticket he told me he didn't care so I voted for the republican Congressman.

It was in this manner, sir, that votes were secured for many republican gentlemen who held seats in the last and perhaps in the present Congress.

But the marshals served another purpose. After selling their own votes for money stolen from the public Treasury, they were ready to intimidate honest voters from the exercise of their franchise. Under the pretense of revising the registration lists, of purging them of fraudulent voters and repeaters, they were sent from house to house throughout the city, a visitation which resulted in the striking off of fifty-seven hundred names, which list was used for challenges at the polls. How this duty was performed, let the record show. I read from page 235:

Question. What did you do with the list, as between democrats and republicans?

Answer. Well, we were told that we knew our business in that.

Q. You were told you knew your business?

A. Captain Bishop furnished—gave me the list, and said, "You know your business, how to do it."

Q. What did you understand from that?

A. Well, what I understood my commission—several things. I understood I was to do all I could in the interest of Metcalfe with the list; that it was for me to keep democrats from coming to the polls and voting that I thought had no right to.

Q. Well, did you strike off many democratic voters?

A. Yes; struck off a good many votes. I don't remember how many.

Q. Of duly qualified voters?

A. They were—I don't know whether they were qualified or not. I think the list was furnished from the central committee. I can't say whether they were qualified or not. I think the list was furnished from the republican central committee.

Q. Did you strike many off?

A. Yes; struck off a good many.

Q. Well, now, after you went to the house and found the man lived there, and you went in and asked if so-and-so was at home, and they said "Yes," and you asked if he would be at home on election day, and they said they didn't know, what did you do with a name like that?

(Objected to as leading.)

A. Well, if it suited us we would strike it off. It was left to our own discretion.

Q. What do you mean by "if it suited you?"

A. Well, I suppose if it was thought to our interest or to Metcalfe's interest to strike it off, we would do it.

How many lawful voters were in this manner deterred from casting their ballots it is impossible to ascertain, but when we consider that these challenges were made by ruffians, in many instances chosen from the dregs of the populace, protected by a badge of office and with power to call out a posse comitatus to arrest and drag the victim to prison, the number of intimidated voters must have been very large.

Success crowned these efforts, a democratic majority of 1,000 or more was overcome, and the purity of the ballot-box was preserved.

The last scene of this conspiracy terminates, sir, in Washington, there where the curtain had been rung up. I will let Mr. Bernard relate it in his own graphic manner, a most fitting peroration to such a mass of crime and corruption. The parties are a little more elevated in rank, but their conversation is of a character which shows that they are not entirely unacquainted with the vernacular of the "swell mob" which has just rendered their party such a service. I read from page 323:

Question. You think those marshals did very good service in the cong ressional election, do you not, Mr. Bernard?

Answer. When I went to Washington with Mr. Mudd, who was chief deputy marshal, for the settlement of this account, Mr. Taft asked Mr. Mudd how many marshals he had.

Mr. SHIELDS. Taft, the Attorney-General?

A. The Attorney-General.

(Counsel for contestee objected to any conversation between the witness and the Attorney-General as irrelevant, and, second, as hearsay; third, as not involved in issues; and, fourth, it took place after the election.)

A. Mr. Taft asked Mr. Mudd how many marshals he had. Mr. Mudd referred him to me, and said I had charge of the marshals; and he turned to me, and I said, "One thousand and twenty-eight." The old gentleman wheels round in his chair and says, "Were there no others out in Missouri you could have made marshals?" Says I, "Mr. Taft, we went in to win, and if it had been necessary to have had a posse comitatus—I think that is what you call it—and every man over fifteen years of age should have seen a fair election;" and he said, "You bring a good deal of sugar in your spade."

Q. "You bring a good deal of sugar in your spade;" what did he mean by that?

A. In your bill.

Q. What did he mean by that?

A. I don't know; I suppose that we had been successful.

If it be true that the tree shall be judged by its fruits, who will hesitate to lay the ax at the roots of a tree which blooms with such Dead Sea fruits as these? The outside promise may be fair, but put these statutes to the test and nothing is disclosed but a mass of corruption. And, indeed, from such laws nothing else is to be expected. They confer a power too great and too dangerous to be trusted in any hands, however pure. I would not trust such a power to an administration of my party. I do not think it can be safely confided in any other. The Executive may have the most upright intentions, but how can he control his subordinates, whose retention in office depends upon the success of his party?

I appeal to gentlemen on the other side to remember that if these laws remain in force, sooner or later, with the political revolutions which are sure to occur, they "will return to plague the inventor." We demand this repeal, sir, in no factious spirit, but because we are convinced that a great principle is at stake; because we believe that here a power is given to the Executive to employ the force and treasure of the State in order to subvert the popular will; that here is a standing legalized menace to that freedom of elections which, once destroyed, can only result in the dissolution of the Republic. We demand it in the name of the people, whose right of choosing those that are to bind them with laws is invaded by these statutes. We demand it because we are profoundly imbued with those sentiments of Locke, where, speaking on this subject, he says:

For thus to regulate candidates and electors and new-model the ways of elections, what is it but to cut up the Government by the roots and poison the very fountain of public security?

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at nine o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 22, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FARLEY presented the petition of M. F. Forrest and other women of Santa Ana, Los Angeles County, California, praying for the passage of an act making effective the anti-polygamy law of 1862; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MAXEY presented the petition of J. M. Wilson and others, citizens of Grayson, Cooke, and Denton Counties, Texas, praying for the establishment of a post-route from Dexter to Pilot Point, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BECK presented the petition of John W. Allen, of Washington, District of Columbia, praying for the passage of an act relieving him from the payment of alleged illegal taxes, for repairing B street and Pennsylvania avenue, in that city; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

CHANGE OF NAME OF NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (S. No. 218) changing the name of the National Bank of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio, to the National Lafayette and Bank of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio, to report it without amendment. I ask that it be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that, instead of the bill being placed on the Calendar, it be put immediately on its passage.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the bill?

Mr. PENDLETON. It is a bill only to change the name of the National Bank of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio. It has been recommended by the banking department in the Treasury and has received the unanimous report of the Committee on Finance. The bill merely provides that a change shall be made in the name of a bank which proposes a reorganization on the 1st of May, and time is rather important.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARRIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 470) to provide for an investigation and examination of the accounts of certain land-grant railroads, in accordance with the decision of the Supreme Court, and for a full report of the results thereof to Congress; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS. I have been requested to introduce a bill to aid in the construction of the Denison and Pacific Railway from Denison, Texas, to the Rio Grande River. I have not examined the bill, and do not wish to be considered either as its advocate or as committed to its provisions.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 471) to aid in the construction of the Denison and Pacific Railway from Denison, Texas, to the Rio Grande; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. COCKRELL. Without previous notice, and by request of a firm of reputable attorneys in this city, I desire to introduce a bill.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 473) for the relief of William R. Testerman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S No. 474) for the relief of William McGovern; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WITHERS (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 475) granting a pension to Henry J. Churchman; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JONAS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 476) for the relief of Thomas M. Simmons; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on the file relating to the case, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VOORHEES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 477) for the relief of General Ward B. Burnett; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move that the accompanying memorial, which is very brief, be printed with the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 478) to replace the name of Laurence A. Williams, late major Sixth Cavalry, United States Army, upon the rolls of the Army; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on the file relating to the case, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 479) for the relief of Riley A. Shinn and Henry P. Gilbert, sureties on the bond of Charles S. English, late collector of customs for the port of Georgetown, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 480) for the relief of William P. Patrick; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

COLORED REFUGEES FROM THE SOUTH.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I have received this morning from the mayor of the city of Wyandotte, and the chairman of the relief committee of that town, a communication upon a subject of public importance, which with the permission of the Senate I will read. It is addressed to my colleague and myself:

COMMITTEE ROOMS OF CITIZENS' RELIEF COMMITTEE,
Wyandotte, Kansas, April 19, 1879.

GENTLEMEN: Hundreds of colored refugees from the Southern States throng our streets, sick and penniless; large numbers have died.

Wyandotte has exhausted her resources in relief that she has already extended.

Large numbers of equally destitute are at our threshold. In this emergency we earnestly appeal to you to use your influence in securing means for their immediate relief, and to enable us to forward these destitute families to western homes, where they can be self-sustaining.

Contributions should be sent to H. M. Northop & Sons, bankers.

Yours, truly,

J. S. STOCKTON,
Mayor, and Chairman of Relief Committee.
E. SPRAGUE,
Secretary.

From authentic information it appears that several thousand of these unfortunate people are delayed in different portions of the Mississippi and Missouri Valleys from Saint Louis northward en route to their destination. I do not propose at this time to advert to the causes, the impulses, or the impetus of this extraordinary migration. Whether they are fugitives from injustice and oppression, or whether they are moved by an irresistible impulse to better their condition, I do not at this time definitely know. It is sufficient to say, however, that the movement is going on, and is rapidly assuming extraordinary proportions.

The great free communities of the West will welcome these people; they will absorb them into the body of their citizens; they will guarantee them in the full exercise and enjoyment of all their political and civil rights; but until the re-adjustment of the social forces can be obtained and the disturbance resulting from this withdrawal of labor from one portion of the country to the other can be settled, burdens are imposed upon localities and communities for which they are not responsible, and which they ought not to be called upon wholly to bear.

There are many instances where Congress has been called upon to relieve suffering occurring under similar circumstances heretofore. The bills for the relief of those who were rendered destitute by the inundations of the Mississippi and for those communities afflicted by yellow fever will occur to those now upon the floor and who have acted upon similar measures during the past two or three years. In view of this emergency I have felt called upon to introduce a bill for the relief of those destitute colored persons now migrating from the Southern States, located in the valleys of the Mississippi and Missouri from Saint Louis northward. I ask that the bill be twice read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, taking this occasion to say that there is urgent necessity for immediate and efficient action upon the subject.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 472) for the relief of destitute colored persons now migrating from the Southern States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. VOORHEES, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Mrs. Elizabeth Wirt Goldsborough, widow of Rear-Admiral Goldsborough, United States Navy, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Shinn & Gilbert be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Alexander Montgomery be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask that the following order be made:

Ordered, That F. W. Ruggles have leave to withdraw his papers from the files of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has there been any adverse report?

Mr. WINDOM. I understand not, but let the order be granted under the rule, whatever it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered if there is no adverse report.

PROPERTY IN CHARGE OF SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I offer the following resolution, on which I ask present consideration; it is a small matter:

Resolved, That the expenses of the commissioner appointed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to inspect the property of the United States in charge of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate be paid out of the miscellaneous item of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the commissioner referred to?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will state that I did not draw the resolution and did not know the word "commissioner" was used, but it does no harm. It is simply an agent, appointed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to inspect the property of the Senate as turned over by the late Sergeant-at-Arms to the present Sergeant-at-Arms, for the benefit of both those officers, to see that it was correct.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire of the Senator what is the amount to be paid under this resolution?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The amount is very small. I suppose it will be about $20 or $25, or something of that kind. It will be a very small amount at least.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no objection to the resolution, but I did not understand from the use of the word "commissioner" what was the purport.

The resolution was agreed to.

ASSISTANT IN DOCUMENT-ROOM.

Mr. PENDLETON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized to appoint an additional assistant in the Senate document-room during the present session of the Senate, said assistant to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate at the same rate now paid the other assistants.

INTEROCEANIC CANAL SURVEYS.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 200 additional copies of the report of the commissioners on an interoceanic route between the Atlantic and Pacific be printed for the use of the Navy Department.

APPOINTMENT AND REMOVAL OF SENATE EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. WALLACE. The resolution introduced by myself several days ago I ask to have considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will come after the routine business. If there is no further morning business the morning hour has expired, and the Chair calls up the resolution on the Calendar offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] to amend the standing order of the Senate in regard to the appointment and removal of the employés of the Senate. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to the resolution offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania, on which question the yeas and nays have been ordered. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. CONKLING. Let us hear the amendment read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert:

That in the opinion of the Senate the correct and safe transaction of the business of the Senate is materially dependent on retaining in its service a corps of experienced, well-trained, and diligent officers; and this can only be done by security in their respective positions so long as they continue faithful in the discharge of their duties.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont contains a very just statement of fact and of opinion; but it seems to me that it is not quite full enough, inasmuch as it declares only a general rule of action of the Senate, without application at all to the removals which have been made or those which may hereafter be made in the discretion of the principal officers of the Senate.

It is very true that a faithful discharge of duty is one of the requisites of a good officer. It is also very true that an officer may be extremely faithful in the discharge of his duties, and yet by reason of his manner he may be disagreeable to Senators, or by reason of his person he may be offensive to them, and therefore not a fit person to discharge acceptably the duties of the office. I propose, therefore, to amend the amendment so as to supply its deficiency in that respect.

It is also, I think, true that the Senate charges certain officers of the body with the duties of their respective offices and holds them responsible for the convenient transaction of business and for the comfort of Senators in the performance of that business. Inasmuch as we hold them to that responsibility, it seems to me that we ought to give them the liberty of appointment and removal, without subjecting their will to that of an officer who, however high he may be in the Government, is not a Senator upon this floor, and is not charged with the responsible duties of a Senator.

I am led more to this conclusion from the fact that the Senate can at any moment relieve these officers, the Secretary and the Sergeant-at-Arms, from the responsibility thus put upon them, by taking to itself the election of any of the subordinate officers. We can thus relieve either one of these officers from the duty of appointment and from the responsibility of the just discharge of the duties committed to the subordinates.

It is with a view of supplying what I think a deficiency in the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, offered by way of substitute for the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that I propose to add to the end of the amendment what I send to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment by adding thereto these words:

And acceptable to a majority of the Senators. And inasmuch as the appointment of the subordinates and the power of dismissal should remain with those officers respectively, who must be responsible for all the service committed to their charge: Therefore,

Resolved, That the standing order of the Senate regulating the appointment and removal of clerks and other employés of the Senate be, and it is hereby, amended by striking out of the same all after the word "respectively," in the third line, so that the same shall read as follows:

"Resolved, That the several officers and others in the departments of the Secretary of the Senate and of the Sergeant-at-Arms, shall be appointed and removed from office by those officers respectively."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, if I were not surprised to hear coming from a democratic source doctrine such as that stated in the amendment to the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator who has just taken his seat, still I should be surprised to hear that doctrine coming from Ohio. If I understand this declaration aright, it is that because the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate is in some sense responsible for the discharge of his duties, and the Secretary of the Senate in like manner responsible for the discharge of his duties, therefore no supervisory power, in one word, nothing but his will, should determine the question of the selection, retention, or removal of subordinates. The Sergeant-at-Arms is not a bonded officer, if I mistake not. The Sergeant-at-Arms gives no bond, does he?

Mr. ANTHONY. No.

Mr. CONKLING. The Sergeant-at-Arms is not the custodian of money in large sums. The Sergeant-at-Arms is not one of the many officers whose responsibilities are so hazardous and delicate in respect of their subordinates. The contrast is very marked between the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and the sub-treasurer at New York, for example, an officer chargeable with millions upon millions constantly, an officer who with sureties gives heavy bonds to render an account of every penny coming into his custody, an officer compelled to employ many deputies and assistants, exposed to every one of whom is all the money for which he must respond. So in the case of marshals, of collectors of customs, of collectors of internal revenue. Yet it has been said by very high democratic authority as I supposed, by the newspapers and the organs of democratic sentiment, by a great body of intelligence deeming reform in the civil service an overmastering topic of importance, that by competitive examination, by the determination of boards constituted for the purpose, by the decision of third persons, bonded officers responsible with their sureties in enormous amounts for the action of their subordinates should be compelled to defer their own judgment and their own power of selection to the determination thus to be made.

It has been said with great force that in such cases officers giving bonds with sureties to respond, and respond for moneys intrusted to their subordinates as well as otherwise, should have the power to select those agents for whom they must thus respond. But despite that argument, it has been said, and said as I supposed with broad sanction of democratic sentiment, that men were politicians, were schemers in the use of Federal patronage, who denied the propriety of having boards of examiners select subordinate officers despite the will of the superior. But now comes the honorable Senator from Ohio, and what does he affirm? That an officer who gives no bonds, who is not the custodian of money but simply the head of the constabulary force of the Senate, the custodian of the furniture of the Senate, the officer to whom the janizaries and doorkeepers of the Senate report, cannot execute safely his office if he is obliged to submit the removals he makes to the President of the Senate; that that supervision so far shackles and impedes him that relief must be had.

Mr. President, this brings me to what struck me in the first place as the leading thought about this resolution, shearing the President of the Senate of his power. The honorable Senator from Ohio, I know not why, strangely oblivious as it seems to me of the selection which has been made, said that the President of the Senate was not a Senator on this floor. What! How can the Senator from Ohio say that of our revered, or, as the filial Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] would say, our venerable, presiding officer? Not a Senator upon this floor! It was the bearing of this proposition upon the distinguished Senator who acts as the moderator and presiding officer of the Senate now that struck me first of all when I heard it read. I should like to know how it happens, when for lo five and twenty years established by democrats on the report of a democratic committee the rule has prevailed that the presiding officer of the Senate should act as a check upon the caprices of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate in dismissing and changing the attendants of the Senate, that now with the leader of the democratic party on this floor in the chair of the President of the Senate, (not a stranger there, but there qua his Senatorship, I remind his colleague)—I should like to know why it is that when he, the democrat of democrats, is in the chair his party associates on this floor propose to deprive him of the power which belongs to his place. What is the meaning of it, Mr. President?

The other day my honorable friend from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] discussed this resolution. No man is more familiar with the amenities and proprieties of official life; no man is more graceful in their illustration than the honorable Senator from Rhode Island; but he will forgive me for saying that I was surprised and pained, after the admirable speech he made, when he took his seat without allusion to the assault which seems to me in this resolution to be made upon the distinguished presiding officer of this body.

I repeat, Mr. President, what does it mean? Do democrats doubt, does the honorable Senator from Ohio doubt the loyalty, the democracy, the thoroughness of administration of the Senator who now presides in the Senate? Does he doubt that he would consent to the removal of any officer who ought to be removed? Or is it a touching and delicate tribute to the presiding officer of the Senate? Does he wish to be relieved from the onerous, I will not say odious, care which it is intended to impose upon him? Does the distinguished presiding officer of the Senate refuse to become the headsman of the democratic party to behead the Union soldiers and cripples who stand about this Chamber? Is it to relieve him from that ungrateful and ungracious task that the practice of a quarter of a century is to be upturned in a moment? I do not know.

I read the other day in a great organ of democratic sentiment—I wish I had it here—an illuminated and pictorial organ of democratic sentiment it was for that day—that the present occupant of the chair is in truth and in reality President of the United States, [laughter,] and when this resolution came in I was reminded of it—President as of the 4th of March, 1877—President now. Well, during that term to which according to this statement he has succeeded, we know that the policy in this regard is expressed by the amendment now pending offered by the Senator from Vermont. During the present presidential term the doctrine and the practice has been that public officers, while they remained faithful, while they discharged their duties, and their characters were unsullied, were to remain in their places; and it struck me that the design of this resolution might be to embarrass in respect of his administration the new presiding officer of the Senate, to establish a doctrine here which he during the present or during his next term of office in the one place or the other would find confronting him should he attempt to continue and perpetuate the modes of purifying and elevating the public service which have recently prevailed.

Now, Mr. President, I do not understand which of these purposes the resolution signifies. I can hardly believe that members of the Senate on either side are seeking about for the small offices, the petty places of laborers and messengers about this building, and that in order to reach them this resolution is introduced. I would rather explain it upon some of the other theories which, in jest or in earnest, I have referred to.

I believe, speaking very seriously, that every word said by that committee of which Mr. Mason was chairman is true, that the convenience of the Senate, not the mere personal likes or dislikes of Senators, but the convenience of the Senate, the readiness of performing the functions of the Senate, the advantage of having experienced men, knowing where to find documents and papers and how to do the various things which they are called to do, is of importance paramount to any value in any sense, political or otherwise, of these offices as patronage. And I regret that after all we heard when the chief officers were chosen, after repeated disclaimers of intentions charged then to remove generally the minor officers of the Senate, it turns out now after the democrats on this floor have elected their chosen President of the Senate so that no political or party prejudice of the presiding officer stands in their way, that in order to make a cleaner sweep than they can hope to do subject to his advice and subject to his action, they come here with a resolution to sweep away a quarter of a century of practice observed by both political parties, and to do that which no one during a generation on either side has proposed in this body. I say I regret it for its appearance and for its effect. It is a mistake when done once, and will be a still greater mistake if it is repeated and perpetuated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. ANTHONY. This resolution was postponed yesterday in the absence of the Senator from Pennsylvania who introduced it, and as the Senator from Vermont who introduced the original amendment is absent, I suggest that the matter lie over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make any motion?

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that it be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. WITHERS. Is the Senator from Vermont absent from the city, does the Senator know?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not know.

Mr. WITHERS. The occasion of the postponement yesterday was that the Senator from Pennsylvania was absent from the city.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suppose if a Senator is absent from the Chamber it does not make much difference where he is.

Mr. WITHERS. His presence may be secured, probably, if he is in the building.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from Vermont has been sent for. He is not in his committee-room. He has not been well for several days, and I presume he is at his house; but I do not know.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the further consideration of this resolution be laid over until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the morning hour has expired, and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] to the sixth section of the bill. On this question the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask the Senator from Iowa to yield to me for an instant. I desire to give notice that, immediately after the disposition of the pending order, the Army bill, on Thursday next, if it shall be convenient, I desire to call up the bill (S. No. 227) to provide that the principal officers of each of the Executive Departments may occupy seats on the floor of the Senate and House of Representatives. Upon that bill I propose to address the Senate, and shall afterward either ask that it be referred to a select committee or that it lie upon the table for further discussion, if Senators desire to speak upon it.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, when I took the floor last evening with a view of submitting some remarks on this bill I did not know that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] had given way yesterday to the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] I understand that he would prefer to go on at this time. If so, I will cheerfully yield to him; otherwise I will proceed. The Senator from Illinois sitting on my right [Mr. DAVIS] desires also to submit some remarks, and if he prefers to go on now I will yield to him.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I will speak after the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, as I intimated yesterday, I desire to submit some remarks on the pending question and I will proceed now by the kindness of the Senator from Iowa to do so, not indulging the hope that I shall be able to say anything new at this late hour of the debate, nor even entertaining the belief that I shall be able to interest the Senate by any remarks I shall address to it. The question has been as thoroughly sifted and discussed as any question I have ever heard debated, or any one of which I have ever read the debates; and really I feel like apologizing to the Senate for attempting to discuss it at this time; but I feel it my duty under the circumstances to submit some general ideas on a few phases of the question to the Senate. The reasons for that course will appear as I progress in the remarks I shall make.

The point immediately in hand is that in the Army appropriation bill the committee reporting it seek to amend section 2002 of the Revised Statutes, which section was passed, the Senate will bear in mind, on the 25th day of February, 1865. That section is only altered in the amendment presented by leaving out after the words "United States" the following words:

Or to keep the peace at the polls.

This bill then proceeds:

That nothing contained in this section, as now amended, shall be held or deemed to abridge or affect the duty or power of the President of the United States, under section 5297 of the Revised Statutes, enacted under and to enable the United States to comply with section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States, on application of the Legislature or executive, as provided for in said section.

Thus holding, under the proviso, what we claim on this side is the only contingency in which under the Constitution, according to section 4, article 4, the President of the United States can call forth the force of the Army of the United States to be used in the respective States. To this amendment the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] offers an amendment in reference to bearing arms. That amendment is objectionable for the same reason that I will offer to keeping the words "or to keep the peace at the polls" in the original statute; but that amendment was so thoroughly disposed of by the convincing and lucid argument of the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] yesterday that it needs nothing more at my hands or those of anybody else in my opinion.

There are two questions now presented: first, should these eight words be stricken from the statute-book, should they in justice and in right go from the book of laws? second, if they should go, is it right and proper that they should make their disappearance by and through an appropriation bill?

These are the two questions in this debate presented by this amendment. Twelve or fifteen years ago this would not have been a debatable question in either House of Congress; twelve or fifteen years ago it would not have been presented in either branch of Congress; and when we look at the country across the water from which we gather in the main our institutions, and the sensitive feeling in this country always in regard to the use of this power in any shape or form except in actual war, it is certainly astonishing, and it must strike the public mind so, that any one should contend that these words should be kept in the statute-book at this time.

I will now give only some few references to the feeling in England upon the use of the army, especially in towns in time of peace, at elections. Many have already been produced, and where I touch upon them it will be only incidentally for the purpose of enforcing some objection I wish to make. I read from Clode on the Military Forces of the Crown, which, by the way, starts out with the following splendid motto taken from Burke, which it will not be out of place to read here:

An armed disciplined body is in its essence dangerous to liberty; undisciplined, it is ruinous to society.

That is the starting point to Clode's work on the Military Forces of the Crown, taken from Burke, volume 5, page 17.

So far as the land forces were needed, upon alarm all the fortresses of the kingdom had been manned by the militia. When for the first time soldiers of the king's army, instead of the hamlet-men—were placed in the tower of London, the people petitioned Parliament, and both houses thought themselves betrayed. An examination of the lieutenant of the tower as to this exceptional proceeding was at once taken and an assurance obtained from him that no guard should come into the tower save of the hamlet-men.

Which means, in our language, our militia—

And we see breathing through our own Constitution parallel in the first article, in the fifteenth paragraph of section 8, that Congress may make rules for calling out the militia to suppress "insurrections and repel invasions," but it does not say call out the regular Army of the United States. Those are the hamlet-men, according to the author here, as named and known in England.

In after years, when the troops were admitted to the tower, they went there under an old established rule—by the order of a parliamentary minister, the secretary at war, and not of a military officer or the commander-in-chief.

What rule is that?—

See how this spirit runs again and is made to live and speak in our own Constitution by one of the amendments that subordinates the military all the time to the civil power. The secretary at war acts not as a war officer, but as a civil officer. It is as a parliamentary minister that he makes that order, and in no other capacity. Now proceed to page 192 of the same volume:

4. As to the presence of soldiery in and about the houses of Parliament, or rather the House of Commons, the rule, until the Crimean war, was that no soldier should be admitted therein, unless sent there as a representative of the people, or called for as a witness by the house.

* * * * * * *

13. The exclusion of soldiers (not being members) from the house probably originated in the prohibition issued by Parliament against the entrance of the guards sent by Charles I for their protection or surveillance. Charles I came to the house with guards, and the Commons protested against it as their journals show. When Charles II, in February, 1669, was accompanied by his guards, the incident called forth the remark from Ralph "that it was the first instance we meet with in history of a sovereign entering upon the exercise of legislative power under the awe and influence of the sort." But whatever might have been the reason of their exclusion it is clear beyond controversy that they were excluded, and that the rule was not relaxed until August, 1855, when they were permitted for the future to enter the house unarmed.

14. As to the presence of soldiers at the election of members for the House of Commons, the rule still is that of exclusion from the places of election save as to those having votes and who come to exercise their elective franchise. The right to vote and to proceed to the election without leave from the Crown or the commanding officer is secured to the soldier by statute; and when summoned to Parliament by order of either house the soldier must, as some contend, obey the summons without leave or order.

On page 197 the celebrated statute 8 George II is referred to:

The preamble lays down the constitutional rule on this subject in these words.

I shall not read the statute, but simply the preamble, because that has not, according to my recollection, been read in this debate:

Whereas by the ancient common law of this land all elections ought to be free; and whereas by an act passed in the third year of the reign of King Edward the First, of famous memory, it is commanded, upon great forfeiture, that no man, by force of arms nor by malice or menacing, shall disturb any to make free election.

By the ancient common law of the land, one of the greatest and, in my judgment, I am ready to say the greatest system of laws yet known to civilized man, all elections ought to be free. That is what our State constitutions say, every one of them, in so many words.

On page 202 and 203 the same author says:

The 10 Victoria, chapter 21, carries out the same arrangements for the troops at elections that, as will be shown in this chapter, Mr. Windham made for them at assizes in 1798. Thus, by section 2, on days appointed for nomination, election, or taking the polls no soldier within two miles of any city or place where such shall take place shall be allowed to go out of the barracks or quarters unless for the purpose of mounting or relieving guard or of giving his vote at such election.

In the year 1861 exception was taken in the House of Commons to the presence of volunteers in military array at the unopposed election of the late Lord Palmerston, and they were prohibited on all future occasions from assembling at drill or any other purpose between the issue of the writ and the termination of the election, or during the progress of any municipal election.

* * * * * * *

The exclusion of the military forces from assize towns during the holding of the assizes dated from an earlier period than the Revolution, and the first order is probably that of Charles II, given in the appendix.

Then, upon page 125 and following, the opinions of the law officers are given concerning these different statutes. In the second volume of the same work, under the title "The action of the military in aid of the civil power," I find:

After the establishment of guards and garrisons in the reign of Charles II, the immediate sequence was their employment under the orders of the Crown in the discharge of police duties. The introduction into our civil polity of such an instrument of coercion was calculated to create—as it failed not to do—a spirit of aversion toward the army, and of suspicion towards the dynasty resting its authority upon such support.

Then he proceeds to tell how that was disposed of and set aside. On page 134:

From the entries in the war-office letter-books, the bread riots in the west of England in 1766 appear to have been the first occasion upon which the secretary at war issued anything like a general order for the troops to act in aid of the civil power without a previous reference to him. The terms in which these instructions were framed show that the course adopted by the secretary at war was novel; but certainly, from the debates, first, on Mr. Burke's motion in 1769 for an inquiry "as to the employment of the military in St. George's fields," and then on Mr. Pownall's motion in 1770 "to introduce a clause into the mutiny bill that the justice should make his requisition in writing," it is evident that the authority of the justice was then fully recognized as a sufficient justification to a military officer for using his men in aid of the civil power.

We shall come to see after a while in a celebrated case in New York that they did not even protect a subordinate officer under an order given to him to have his troops on election day and exhibit them around there.

In the period which intervened before the employment of the military in aid of the civil magistrate again came under discussion, the legislature had restrained the Crown from employing the militia as a military force except in case of rebellion, and then only upon a previous communication to Parliament, if sitting, or by order of council. Moreover, the power of the lord-lieutenant to search for arms to secure the public peace was withdrawn. The restriction still remains, and there is at the present time no statutory authority for the *dis*embodied militia to act in aid of the civil power, while, on the other hand, an opinion of some weight has been expressed in Parliament that the force should never be used in that service.

That concludes the references I wish to make in Clode's book, and I produce them for the purpose of showing, in addition to the authorities already offered to the Senate by other Senators who have spoken on the subject, what a concurrence of opinion and what a uniformity of sentiment exist in the country from which we take our institutions in great part, the country alluded to so well yesterday by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] as differing in so few respects from our constitution of government.

Now, if the Senate will go with me for a while in tracing that sentiment from that country to this, we shall find it embodied in the Constitution and laws of the United States as well as those of the different States. There is not a varying feature, there is not a dissenting expression, there is not a difference of opinion anywhere to be found until this statute of 1865 became a law, as to the mere presence of the military, whether for drill or for exercise or for any other purpose, not merely at elections, but at the time of holding court, at the time of dispensing justice on the day of election.

Let us come to our own country. I wish to read where this law is summarized by Judge Cooley, in his work on constitutional limitations. On page 614, under the title of "the freedom of elections," he says:

To keep every election free of all the influences and surroundings which might bear improperly upon it, or might impel the electors to cast their suffrages otherwise than as their judgments would dictate, has always been a prominent object in American legislation. We have referred to fundamental principles which protect the secrecy of the ballot, but in addition to these there are express constitutional and statutory provisions looking to the accomplishment of the same general purpose. It is provided by the constitutions of several of the States that bribery of an elector shall constitute a disqualification of the right to vote or to hold office. The treating of an elector, with a view to influence his vote, is in some States made an indictable offense. Courts are not allowed to be held, for the two reasons that the electors ought to be left free to devote their attention to the exercise of this high trust, and that suits, if allowed on that day, might be used as a means of intimidation.

He refers there to two cases of some prominence in the New York reports.

Legal process in some States, and for the same reasons, is not permitted to be served on that day; intimidation of voters by threats or otherwise is made punishable, and generally all such precautions as the people in framing their organic law, or the Legislature afterwards, have thought might be made available for the purpose have been provided with a view to secure the most completely free and unbiased expression of opinion that shall be possible.

Now we come to the point here:

And with a just sense of the danger of military interference, where a trust is to be exercised, the highest as well as the most delicate in the whole machinery of government, it has not been thought unwise to prohibit the militia being called out on election days, even though for no other purpose than for enrolling and organizing them.

He refers there to a New York case, which I shall take occasion to cite after a while.

The ordinary police is the peace force of the State, and its presence suggests order, individual safety, and public security; but when the militia appear upon the stage, even though composed of citizen militia, the circumstances must be assumed to be extraordinary, and there is always an appearance of threatening and dangerous compulsion which might easily interfere seriously with that calm and unimpassioned discharge of the elector's duty which the law so justly favors. The soldier in organized ranks can know no law but such as is given him by his commanding officer, and when he appears at the polls there is necessarily a suggestion of the presence of an enemy, against whom he may be compelled to exercise the most extreme and destructive force, and that enemy must generally be the party out of power, while the authority that commands the force directed against them will be the executive authority of the State for the time being wielded by their opponents.

The very sentiment which, in another form, General Grant himself published, that was read so timely the other day by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME,] and I may also take occasion to refer to it before I finish.

It is consequently of the highest importance that the presence of a military force at the polls be not suffered except in serious emergencies, when disorders exist or are threatened for the suppression or prevention of which the ordinary peace force is insufficient; and any statute which should provide for or permit such presence as an unusual occurrence or except in the last resort, though it might not be void, would nevertheless be a serious invasion of constitutional right and should not be submitted to in a free government without vigorous remonstrance.

That is the result of the authorities summarized by Judge Cooley in a book that we all read with pleasure and interest and, I hope, with profit. Now, I wish to call attention to the New York case here referred to, 11 Johnson, 521. A subordinate officer brought his company out on the day of election simply for the purpose of enrolling and organizing, not to drill them, not to make any demonstration. He was sued for that, and he pleaded two matters: first, that it was merely for the purpose of enrolling; and, second, that he acted under the orders of his superior officers. The court held both pleas insufficient, and said:

Under the twenty-fifth section of the act to regulate elections, (sess. 36, c. 41,) no officer can order out any part of the militia during any election, or ten days previous thereto, even for the purpose of enrolling or organizing them, and not to exercise.

Merely for the purpose of putting their names on the books and organizing them and then sending them home; but the court said, "No, they had no business there." Their very appearance, in the language of Judge Cooley, suggested menace, gave suspicion of intimidation, which was not to be tolerated at a free election; and an election is not an election when it is not free. I read this to show the jealousy existing all over this country at the exercise of any such power as this, and that it is discountenanced by all the authorities, the highest as well as the lowest. I could quote other cases (but I do not care to detain the Senate) that are referred to by Judge Cooley. Why is this, Mr. President? The very preamble to the Constitution of the United States, among other things, says it was formed for the purpose of securing "liberty to ourselves and our posterity." The personal right, the personal liberty of the voter is to be secured. That is what it is, to secure his liberty in all that is guaranteed to him, and there is nothing more sacred than the right of voting at a free election. Mr. Jefferson and Luther Martin both opposed with all the violence and all the power of their nature and their intellect the adoption of the Constitution, because, among other things, it did not have in it what is called a bill of rights. Mr. Hamilton and others answered that the Constitution itself was a bill of rights. But the people were not satisfied with that answer, and the clamor rose so high that at the very first session of Congress the first ten amendments were proposed, nearly all of which looked to the personal liberty and personal rights of the citizens. So sensitive now has this feeling become, not with our side but with the other side also, that even in the testimony taken before a committee of which I have the honor to be a member, great efforts have been made to show, noticeably at Columbus, Mississippi, that a cannon was fired on election morning just before the opening of the polls. For what purpose? Evidently for the purpose of showing that there was intimidation through the belching of this cannon. If they can have on a fit of indignation for that act, what must we who oppose this whole business say as to companies and platoons and regiments mustering around on the day of election with bayonets in their hands? The feeling is well founded, I admit; but the firing of a cannon is mere child's play, mere nonsense, compared with the mustering of companies by sections and platoons on the day of election. At the arsenals they have been firing a cannon, and probably do it yet, late in the evening and early in the morning for the purpose of indicating the rising and setting of the sun, and to make it more binding. What the people in Columbus and other places fired cannon for I do not know, but I share this feeling with the other side. They have no business to be firing cannon on election day; and if they have not, they have no business mustering companies with bayonets in the presence of the voters and the ballot-box on the day of election in the States to keep the peace of the States.

Mr. President, what peace are they there to keep; whose peace is it? It is not the peace of the United States, for I say there is no such thing as the peace of the United States under our Constitution and our laws, except possibly it is in the forts, arsenals, and dock-yards. There is no such thing. It is evidently the peace of the State of Indiana, or the State of Arkansas, or the State of Ohio as the case may be, where the election is held. Judge Cooley says, so do the English authorities, that the police power is sufficient for that. At all events if it is not sufficient the United States cannot supply it with its militia, if it has any, or with its regular troops. Suppose a United States soldier arrests me for violating the peace, as it is called on election day, and I am voting at Indianapolis, Indiana, whose peace have I violated? Who is to try me? The United States courts? Not at all. Suppose I am convicted, who is to pardon me? The President cannot pardon me for I have offended against no peace of the United States. I hold, under the course of the argument I am attempting to make, strengthened by that taken by the Senator from Texas yesterday, [Mr. MAXEY,] that you had just as well send down the troops to guard and watch the city of New Orleans and the city of Mobile, to do their patrol and police duty, as to send down soldiers there on the day of election. The police powers belong to the States and, as the Supreme Court has often said, they cannot be surrendered. But, says the Senator from Maine, there are only fifty-seven in Arkansas, twenty-nine in Georgia, and none in Missouri. Those fifty-seven in Arkansas I know, and it gives me great pleasure to attest their good sense and their patriotism and their great conervatism. The commanding officer at that post is a gentleman of intelligence and culture in any society, and in any circle; and I take occasion to say here, that I do not believe from General Sherman to the lowest soldier of the American Army they want this power or that they care to have it, and they would rather be rid of it.

But the Senator from Maine ignores the principle and confines himself to the mere matter of the size of the agent that inflicts the evil or the size of the result. It is told in some old books by the malicious opposers of the Catholic religion that the priests in forgiving sins make parties who come before them and confess that they have stolen goods divide the profits with them before they forgive them; and in one instance, as a stray member of the church happened to steal a very large black hog, the priest said to him that was a sin of more than ordinary capacity and he should have to charge him three-fourths of that hog to forgive him. [Laughter.] Marryatt exhausted the force of that argument in his Midshipman Easy when Mrs. Easy's nurse was found to have been the mother of an illegitimate child. He tells the story thus:

Dr. Middleton, who sat between the bed and Mr. Easy's chair, rubbed his hands and laughed.

In the mean time Mr. Easy had untied the string and taken off the cap of the young woman, and was very busy putting his fingers through her hair, during which the face of the young woman expressed fear and astonishment.

"I am glad to perceive that you have a large portion of benevolence."

"Yes," replied the young woman, dropping a courtesy.

"And veneration, also."

"Thanky, sir."

"And the organ of modesty is strongly developed."

"Yes, sir," replied the girl, with a smile.

"That's quite a new organ," thought Dr. Middleton.

"Philoprogenitiveness very powerful."

"If you please, sir, I don't know what that is," answered Sarah, with a courtesy.

"Nevertheless, you have given us a practical illustration. Mrs. Easy, I am satisfied. Have you any questions to ask? But it is quite unnecessary."

"To be sure I have, Mr. Easy. Pray, young woman, what is your name?"

"Sarah, if you please, ma'am."

"How long have you been married?"

"Married, ma'am?"

"Yes, married."

"If you please, ma'am, I had a misfortune, ma'am," replied the girl, casting down her eyes.

"What, have you not been married?"

"No, ma'am, not yet."

"Good heavens! Dr. Middleton, what can you mean by bringing this person here?" exclaimed Mrs. Easy. "Not a married woman, and she has a child!"

"If you please, ma'am," interrupted the young woman, dropping a courtesy, "it was a very little one."

"A very little one!" exclaimed Mrs. Easy.

"Yes, ma'am, very small indeed, and died soon after it was born."

That is the argument now of the Senator from Maine. Now I care not if there is but one soldier in Arkansas, or if there is none there, the authority existing at the White House is the terror at last. We all know it is not the commandant of the forces or the forces themselves, but it is the authority that lies back of them which is to be feared. The flag of the United States on a piece of land, though there be no soldier there, is what strikes terror to the person who would molest the property of the Union. It is not the poor disabled soldiers out at the Soldiers' Home whom the people fear who may go there to commit depredations and destroy that property, but it is what lies behind them. The few shillings that brought Charles's neck to the block would not have paid for a coffin to bury him. The tax upon the tea that brought the Revolution about was not worth the life of the meanest soldier that died in the cause. Away with such arguments about the size of the Army! It could almost in the twinkling of an eye be made twenty thousand to choke the liberties of a State to death and trample it under foot forever.

Mr. President, I wish to read before I quit that branch of the subject from a letter of the present Secretary of State when he was Attorney-General in 1868. It was addressed to Alexander Magruder, a United States marshal, by William M. Evarts, Attorney-General, and at that time Mr. Evarts, as the papers had it, was confined in his room living on bread and water by way of physical diet, and on Hawkins's Pleas of the Crown and Howell's State Trials and York on Forfeiture by way of mental diet to prosecute Mr. Davis and the leaders of the rebellion for treason. Here is his letter:

The special duty and authority in the execution of process issued to you must not be confounded with the duty and authority of suppressing disorder and preserving the peace, which, under our Government, belongs to the civil authorities of the States, and not to the civil authorities of the United States.

That was common school-boy learning until the statute of 1865 was passed. That is what Judge Cooley says; that is what all the authorities say. After stating the marshal's duties under the law, Attorney-General Evarts proceeds:

I have thus called your attention to the general considerations bearing upon the subject to which your letter refers, for the purpose of securing a due observance of the limits of your duty and authority in connection therewith. Nothing can be less in accordance with the nature of our Government or the disposition of our people than a frequent or ready resort to military aid in the execution of the duties confided to civil officers. Courage, vigor, and intrepidity are appropriate qualities for the civil service which the marshals of the United States are expected to perform, and a reinforcement of their power by extraordinary means is permitted by the law only in extraordinary emergencies.

Using the very language of Judge Cooley. I will not read the letter of General Grant. It is fresh in the memory of the Senate, having been read by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GROOME] the other day. It preceded this. Written in 1866, it came before the letter of Mr. Evarts. In it he said that he hoped it would never be, particularly in his official career, necessary to use military force at the elections, and he used substantially the language that Judge Cooley does. He deprecated the use of military force then, as every patriot must deprecate it. There must be no two ideas on that subject.

But, says the Senator from Maine, this was a war measure, a measure ingrafted upon the statute-book in time of war. We have been told by one of the best decisions ever delivered by the Supreme Court of the United States that we had a Constitution for peace and for war as well, the same Constitution for both. I propose to read, as familiar as that is, one or two sections from that decision. I refer to the celebrated Milligan case, one of the opinions that were made not to die:

The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times—and under all circumstances. No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false; for the Government, within the Constitution, has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence, as has been happily proved by the result of the great effort to throw off its just authority.

That is the decision made almost immediately after the first hush of arms on the soil of this country at the close of the late war. I can imagine, and so I suppose can the eminent and distinguished jurist who delivered this opinion, that in case of war there might be no election at all; it might tie up the whole election machinery and put it away; but if there is an election it must be free, because he stultifies himself who says an election is an election when it is not free.

But grant that the war power if you please, like charity that covers a multitude of sins, justifies all these acts, what war is going on now in this country? Where is there any war? The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] when he introduced his roving resolution some days ago—I mean no disrespect by calling it by that name—prefaced his remarks by saying that there was no war, that it was a time of profound peace, when the tramp of the soldier was not heard, or words to that effect. Now, where is the war? All the States are back in this Government, or, to use the happy expression of Mr. Lincoln, are in practical relations with the General Government, and the bare fact of the smallness of the Army that the Senator from Maine planted himself upon so squarely is a fact sufficient to prove that there is no war, and the pretense of keeping the peace at the polls is a sheer pretense in fact.

Now, the "extraordinary emergency," to use the language of Mr. Evarts and of Judge Cooley, does not exist for the exercise of this power. We are as peaceful to-day in every part of the South (so far as that is attempted to be made the Ireland of this country) as in Massachusetts or in Maine or any portion of the Union; and the complaint that we have against the gentlemen on the other side and their party—and I am not much of a complaining man; I am as accepting a man as you will ever find, I expect—is that they are shedding or attempting to shed at this time, as David accused Joab, the blood of war in time of peace. You cannot run this country in time of peace in a war harness; the country will not permit it. If there was a necessity for it in 1865, which I say legally and constitutionally there was not, that necessity no longer exists. It is a maxim of the old system of law that the reason of the law ceasing, the law should cease. If the necessity that brought forth this law existed, but has departed, let this law depart with it. That is the common sense, that is the plain, unvarnished English of this matter.

Now a few words as to the appropriation bill; for I have finished the other branch of the argument. Complaint has been made that repealing these sections in an appropriation bill is not to be permitted. Mr. President, this has become sanctioned by a practice now nearly as old as I am in this Government. It has become so completely interwoven in the very web and woof of the Government in its parliamentary course that there can be no going behind it, no disputing it. Men of all parties have done this thing. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] the other day, the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES,] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] showed various acts of this kind on the part of the party that oppose this bill. I do not wish to refer to any of them for the purpose of accusing them or for the purpose of showing their shortcomings.

The power of the House of Representatives to originate money bills and the power of Congress to raise and support armies are unlimited except as to the duration of the appropriation. They are the judges of how it shall be done and what disposition shall be made of it; and I will court the investigation of gentlemen to this proposition: can they find an Army appropriation bill in which some provision specifying how the Army shall be commanded, where it shall be, and when it shall go, is not to be found?

The appropriations for building bridges, for erecting public buildings, and so on, contain provisions of that character. For symmetry and propriety of legislation, I admit with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] that it is not proper and right in itself, but nothing short of a constitutional amendment can ever get it out of our system of legislation. There is one statute of this sort that I shall be pardoned for referring to, because my memory loves fondly to linger upon it. That is to be found in sixteenth Statutes at Large, page

235. In the general legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, there I find the following:

For payment of judgments which may be rendered by the court in favor of claimants, $100,000: Provided.

Here comes a long proviso—I shall not read it all but it is what is known as the celebrated Drake amendment—in which the whole law and the whole system of pardons by the President was attempted to be reversed and the doctrine lying at the bottom of it turned back on the country. For example, instead of the pardon when it was produced in the Court of Claims showing that the man was loyal, it was to be taken as evidence that he was disloyal, and the Supreme Court was denied jurisdiction of a case which had been dismissed on a plea of that sort. But the safety-valve of the Government had not yet been expelled from this country, and when Klein's case (reported in 13 Wallace) went to the Supreme Court they said to these gentlemen, "Stand aside, the Supreme Court has already said in a case in 4 Wallace that the pardon was as broad as the offense and necessarily the grace must be as broad as the sin, and when the man is pardoned he is restored as though he had never committed the offense." I myself received from Andrew Johnson a pardon as big as a Dutch blanket. I pleaded that in the Supreme Court and they announced the doctrine there that I was fully as good a man, if not somewhat better, than I was before I committed treason; and in the case of Klein, in 13 Wallace, the Supreme Court said this celebrated Drake amendment could not stand; it was unconstitutional—I will not use the word revolutionary, but that came as near being a revolution by legislation as any I have been able to find on the statute-book—it subverted the whole doctrine of pardons and the power of the President to grant them and the operation of a pardon when granted; and therefore this act must stand as if it never had been passed. After providing $100,000 for the Court of Claims, that act went on to say:

Provided, That no pardon or amnesty granted by the President, whether general or special, by proclamation or otherwise, nor any acceptance of such pardon or amnesty, nor oath taken, or other act performed in pursuance or as a condition thereof, shall be admissible in evidence on the part of any claimant in the Court of Claims as evidence in support of any claim against the United States, or to establish the standing of any claimant in said court, or his right to bring or maintain suit therein; nor shall any such pardon, amnesty, acceptance, oath, or other act as aforesaid, heretofore offered or put in evidence on behalf of any claimant in said court, be used or considered by said court, or by the appellate court on appeal from said court, in deciding upon the claim of said claimant, or any appeal therefrom, as any part of the proof to sustain the claim of the claimant, or to entitle him to maintain his action in said Court of Claims, or on appeal therefrom; but the proof of loyalty required by the twelfth section of the act of March 3, 1863, entitled "An act to amend an act to establish a court for the investigation of claims against the United States," approved February 24, 1855, and by the third section of the act entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property, and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States," approved March 12, 1863, and by the third section of the act entitled "An act to provide for appeals from the Court of Claims, and for other purposes," approved June 25, 1868, shall be made by proof of the matters required by said sections, respectively, irrespective of the effect of any executive proclamation, pardon, amnesty, or other act of condonation or oblivion. And in all cases where judgment shall have been heretofore rendered in the Court of Claims in favor of any claimant on any other proof of loyalty than such as is above required and provided, and which is hereby declared to have been and to be the true intent and meaning of said respective acts, the Supreme Court shall, on appeal, have no further jurisdiction of the cause, and shall dismiss the same for want of jurisdiction: And provided further, That whenever any pardon shall have heretofore been granted by the President of the United States to any person bringing suit in the Court of Claims for the proceeds of abandoned or captured property under the said act approved March 12, 1863, and the acts amendatory of the same, and such pardon shall recite, in substance, that such person took part in the late rebellion against the Government of the United States, or was guilty of any act of rebellion against or disloyalty to the United States, and such pardon shall have been accepted in writing, by the person to whom the same issued, without an express disclaimer of and protestation against such fact of guilt contained in such acceptance, such pardon and acceptance shall be taken and deemed in such suit in the said Court of Claims, and on appeal therefrom, conclusive evidence that such person did take part in and give aid and comfort to the late rebellion, and did not maintain true allegiance or consistently adhere to the United States; and on proof of such pardon and acceptance, which proof may be heard summarily on motion or otherwise, the jurisdiction of the court in the case shall cease, and the court shall forthwith dismiss the suit of such claimant.

It was decided in England and followed in this country on the question of pardon, that after a man had received his pardon, an action of slander would lie against a person for accusing him of committing the offense of which he was pardoned. That doctrine has been repeated here in this country. Now they reverse the engine completely, and say when he exhibits his pardon it is proof that he is disloyal. The Court of Claims dismissed Klein on that, and he appealed to the Supreme Court. That is a statute which it would be well for people to remember and not forget. It is one of those unfortunate things that occur in time of high partisan feeling, but which I for one hope has passed away never to return, the last semblance of which being the matter we now have in hand.

I will not say all these acts were passed with a view to coercive purposes, but all these acts tended to this—and let the student of the philosophy of the history of our Government and its nature think of that a moment—tended to make what I believe Mr. Thaddeus Stevens claimed openly in the other House, that this was a congressional government as distinguished from a constitutional government; that Congress was the government of this country as Parliament was of England. But soon after the passage of these acts, of course not for the purpose of coercing Andrew Johnson—nobody would say that—failing to secure what they thought was in hand through Congress, Cæsar came and with the coming of Cæsar they supposed all things else would come that it was desirable should come, and it was believed that through the President, General Grant, all these things could be accomplished with or without legislation of this character, notwithstanding the grand letter he had written in 1866 when he was General-in-Chief of the Army. If such statutes as this can find themselves on an appropriation bill, let no man, woman, or child in this country complain of that mode of proceeding so that we take care that there shall not be unconstitutional provisions incorporated.

But further, when we met in December under the law, our term was limited to the 4th of March. In the great clash of business requiring the passage of bills and the pressure for investigating different measures, these provisions of the statute which the country demands shall be repealed had little or no opportunity for consideration in separate bills. They would have perished either in one House or the other, or between the two, as it turned out they did at the last hours of the session. Now mark. Immediately upon that the Congress is called together, for what purpose? For the purpose of considering appropriation bills alone. How else are you to get off these provisions that, if I am not mistaken, the country is loudly clamoring for the repeal of? The President's message is not longer than the blade of an ordinary penknife, calling us together. He calls us for two appropriation bills. He says virtually, "consider them, and go home." We propose to consider them with all other measures necessary to protect the rights of citizens in this country.

The Senator from Maine the other day undertook to frighten us by telling us this fine Capitol would have to go down and not be kept up, and our commerce would be suspended, and our Supreme Court and other courts. That there may be no misunderstanding on that proposition, so far as I am concerned, I have to say that I would see this building crumble and given up to the owls and bats and rats, and every ship of ours rot in its moorings, and the Supreme Court and all the balance of them suspended before I would see, without attempting to protect them, the rights of the humblest citizen shackled by legislation of Congress, or the humblest citizen of this country deprived of his rights in any way. The twelve Cæsars, when they punished men for what they thought, boasted of the splendor and grandeur of their great city, when their legions were trampling their citizens under foot as so many leaves in the forest. They had their blazing avenues; they had their grand domes and their magnificent palaces; but the personal liberty of the citizen was gone. Give me that first, and I will then help build your fine temples and your commerce and all that. The boast of the English government is that its humblest citizen will receive its protection, if it be at the mouth of their cannon, whether he is on their own soil or on foreign distant soil, and that is the secret of the strength and power of that government to-day. I concur with the eloquent words of the Senator from Indiana, that the people are not going to stand upon the order in which these vicious measures shall be taken from the statute-book; they want them off. We have asked to have them taken off, and if we cannot get them out of the way by any other means than through appropriation bills, bring on your appropriation bill and let us have them there.

There is no coercion in this; I mean no coercion to the President. He is as independent in his sphere as we are in ours; and we are as independent in ours as he is. Did we when we passed the Chinese bill send over to him to know whether he would veto it or not? Did we when we passed the silver bill? Are we reduced to this that we must send to him as it were in the old code of practice a "letter missive" requesting him to hold up his hand? Let him do his duty and let us do our duty, and then all will go on well. I have no fault to find with these gentlemen if they conscientiously believe this, but I repudiate the idea that any person on this side wants to coerce the President. No intimation of that character has been given out. We heard floating around us rumors that he would veto the Chinese bill, and it fell with his veto. We heard then as now that he would veto the silver bill; which he did, and it was passed almost before his veto was dry on the table. With a general sentiment here at this session evidenced by the resolution introduced by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] that we should consider no general legislation during the session, how are we to approach and get to this second bill of rights for the American citizen except through the medium of the appropriation bills? If the Senators on the other side give us a plan, I am perfectly willing to adopt it.

So, Mr. President, this measure in itself is unjust, and it should go out of the statute-book. That I do not believe any man can doubt. Is it proper that the repeal should be in an appropriation bill? It is supported by precedent so long back that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary; and if it was not, there is no other means to get at it but through an appropriation bill.

I have discussed the question as it suggested itself to me, and I have done it in good feeling to all. I believe yet, notwithstanding the threat of coercion and revolution and all that, the country will still live. Somehow or other it manages to get along and live. I believe yet a high destiny is before us, but that destiny is best secured by adhering to the Constitution, never going away from it; and adhering to that, I believe that yet, like the hand on the sun-dial, we shall count only the hours that are bright.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President, the caucus is an important factor in American politics, and both the great parties of the country employ its agency. This is done on the theory that party action is most easily perfected by this method. I do not complain of the mode adopted to reach results, but as I have been for many years viewing public affairs from an independent stand-point, it does not help me to decide any question that may come before the Senate. Although usually preferring to give a silent vote, I cannot suffer this measure to be passed on without saying something on the subject.

The heat that has been manifested on the occasion of this debate has surprised me, if anything can surprise me in politics. A stranger unaccustomed to our modes of debate would suppose that the Union was in danger, and that the old questions, passions, prejudices, and purposes which it had been thought were laid aside forever were again revived. And this, too, fourteen years after the rebellion was conquered, and when there is no complaint from any quarter that the Federal compact presses too hard upon one section at the expense of another, and when the Federal Government is obeyed throughout the entire South.

There does not seem to be the least ground for the excitement and bitterness that have characterized the discussions in Congress at this session, and I should be amazed were it not that the record of all parties prove that majorities invariably commit legislative wrongs and minorities invariably protest against them. If it be true as charged that the success of one of the great parties of the country means revolution and ruin to constitutional liberty, of what value would be the securities of the Government, or indeed any other species of property? In the nature of things, if a revolution was impending or there was any danger apprehended to free government or popular liberty, the Government would not be able to sell bonds at 4 per cent. interest, nor the stock market in New York maintain its present high rate.

This charge, Mr. President, is mere fiction and has no foundation to rest on, but it produces infinite mischief and tends to demoralize the country and every material interest in it; alarms the thoughtless and timid, unsettles business and values, and produces a state of unrest in every community. It may succeed in winning elections, but it cannot restore prosperity. That great object can never be accomplished through a continuance of sectional strife and the violence that accompanies it, nor do I believe the people are in the mood for this kind of politics. They have had more than five years of harsh experience and they want to find some mode of relief from their present sufferings and impoverished condition. And they will honor the statesman who contributes to the stock of knowledge on this subject rather than the political leader who will not let the past alone.

I have no peronals concern, Mr. President, in the rise and fall of parties, but I am deeply solicitous that the affairs of Government shall be so administered that labor seeking employment can obtain it; that all industrial pursuits will be suitably rewarded, and that heart be given to the people, North and South, to work out of their present embarrassments. We are one people, of the same blood and with the same destiny, and unity of feeling is essential to lift us out of the mire and to help us on the road to prosperity.

The different parts of our common country are so intimately connected in trade and commerce that, as a general rule, whatever injuriously affects one part has a corresponding effect on the other, and whatever benefits the one benefits the other.

It is, Mr. President, in my judgment, the imperative duty of the hour, instead of turning the attention of the people back into history with its animosities, to direct it to the troubled business interests of the country and the way to relieve them.

With the past buried and discussions on living issues, the people would soon regain confidence which is essential in any plan for relieving the present hard times. It may be that such a course would affect the fortunes of parties—for both parties in Congress on any question of practical legislation fall to pieces—but it would have the most beneficial effect upon the fortunes of the country.

Without intending to reflect upon the patriotism of either party, it does appear to me that the speeches on the pending bill do not represent the wishes or opinions of the masses of the people of either section. Experience has taught them that legitimate business principles which lead to wealth and social happiness require a cessation from agitation on past subjects, and that sound policy dictates the cultivation of peace and good-will between the sections. The country, Mr. President, cannot be prosperous so long as the old conflict between the North and South is used at each recurring presidential election as an instrumentality of party success, and the statesman who shall rise equal to the occasion, and put it at rest, will receive the gratitude of a suffering people.

The bill before us is for the support of the Army for the ensuing fiscal year. It is attacked because the sixth section alters two provisions of the Revised Statutes. Section 2002 of these statutes reads as follows:

No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control, any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States, or to keep the peace at the polls.

And section 5528 is in these words:

Every officer of the Army or Navy, or other person in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, who orders, brings, keeps, or has under his authority or control, any troops or armed men at any place where a general or special election is held in any State, unless such force be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States or to keep the peace at the polls, shall be fined not more than $5,000, and suffer imprisonment at hard labor not less than three months nor more than five years.

These sections, though widely separated in the Revised Statutes, are parts of a general law passed on the 25th of February, 1865, "to prevent officers of the Army and Navy and other persons engaged in the service from interfering in elections in the States." (Statutes at Large, volume 13, page 437.)

The first section denounced the use of troops at elections except in two specified cases, and the second section provided the penalties for disobedience. The two excepted cases are when the troops were necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States or to keep peace at the polls. The sixth section of the appropriation bill proposes to strike from both sections the words "or to keep the peace at the polls," and nothing more, so that the Army cannot be used hereafter at elections for any purpose. As an abstract proposition can there be any rational objection to this? Ought the Army to be used at the polls when there has been profound peace for more than a decade? Does any one believe that such a law would ever have received the approval of the American Congress if it had been brought forward in a time of peace? It was passed when a formidable civil war was in progress, taxing to the utmost the resources of the country.

In the opinion of the patriots of that day the state of feeling in certain parts of the country was of such a character as to endanger peaceful elections while the war lasted, unless a military force was kept in readiness for any outbreak of popular commotion. This was the conviction that prompted the legislation, but I venture to say no one of the eminent men who voted for it intended or expected that it would remain a part of the permanent law of the land. They were too well read in the lessons of history and the traditions of the Anglo-Saxon race to believe that a free people would tolerate—except on great emergencies like a war waged for the maintenance of the Union—the interference of the military in civic concerns. And they were men of principle and did not wish it to be otherwise.

It is no new thing in time of peace to repeal a law passed in time of war. Indeed, no wise statesman will hesitate to do it if the law be unsuitable to the changed condition of things. It is a part of the very nature of every man of our race to rebel against anything which interferes with the freedom of elections, and the days of the Republic are numbered if the people ever consent to place the ballot-box under the protection of the bayonet.

But, Mr. President, this consent will never be obtained until they have forgotten the principles of constitutional liberty and the precedents set by the Commons of England. These precedents I refrain from referring to at length, but the preamble to an act passed in the time of George II (1735) forbidding the presence of troops at elections is so appropriate that I beg leave to read it:

Whereas by the ancient common law of this land all elections ought to be free; and whereas by an act passed in the third year of the reign of King Edward the First, of famous memory, it is commanded, upon great forfeiture, that no man, by force of arms, nor by malice or menacing, shall disturb any to make free election; and forasmuch as the freedom of elections of members to serve in Parliament is of the utmost consequence to the preservation of the rights and liberties of this kingdom; and whereas it has been the usage and practice to cause any regiment, troop, or company, or any number of soldiers which hath been quartered in any city, borough, town, or place where any election of members to serve in Parliament hath been appointed to be made, to remove and continue out of the same during the time of such election, except in such particular cases as are hereinafter specified.—Pickering's Statutes, volume 16.

And the History of Parliament contains this incident:

The military having been called in to quell an alleged riot at Westminster election in 1741, it was resolved, December 22, "that the presence of a regular body of armed soldiers at an election of members to serve in Parliament is a high infringement of the liberties of the subject, a manifest violation of the freedom of elections, and an open defiance of the laws and constitution of this kingdom." The persons concerned in this, having been ordered to attend the house, received, on their knees, a very severe reprimand from the speaker.—Parliament History, IX, 326.

Can it be possible that a principle of common law—the right of the people to have an election free from the presence of troops—so dear to Englishmen one hundred years ago is not equally dear to their descendants at the present day?

Mr. President, it will require some one now living to write accurately the history of these times, for the future historian will be slow to believe that there was any basis on which to rest such an inquiry in the Congress of the United States during the latter part of the nineteenth century. Why, then, should not the law of 1865 be altered in the manner proposed by this bill?

It is said that Mr. Lincoln signed it, and the inference is that it would reflect on his memory to change it. To say the least this is a pretty strong presumption from such a predicate. No man loved Mr. Lincoln better or honors his memory more than I do, nor had any one greater opportunities to learn the constitution of his mind and character and his habits of thought. He was large-hearted, wiser than those associated with him, full of sympathy for struggling humanity, without malice, with charity for erring man, loving his whole country with a deep devotion, and intensely anxious to save it. Believing as I do that he was raised up by Providence for the great crisis of the war of the rebellion, I have equal belief, had he lived, we would have been spared much of the strife of these latter days, and that we now would be on the high road to prosperity. Such a man, hating all forms of oppression, and deeply imbued with the principle that induced the men of 1776 to resist the stamp tax, would never have willingly intrusted power to any one, unless war was flagrant, to send troops to oversee an election.

Why, then, I repeat, should not the proposed measure pass? There is no rebellion, nor any threatened, nor any domestic uproar anywhere. The Union is cemented by the blood that was shed in defense of its integrity; the laws are obeyed North and South, East and West, and our only real differences relate to the administration of the internal affairs of the Government. By the constitution of the human mind, there will of necessity be diverse opinions among the people on the best way to manage their internal affairs, and Congress meets periodically to legislate for the people and to represent their views on the questions dividing them. But surely these differences, be they great or small, afford no justification for a departure from any of the principles that underlie republican government. If they do, the charter of our liberties will be soon frittered away.

The charge that this is "revolutionary" legislation has no force. It might be called a partisan device. Congress has power under the Constitution to raise and equip armies, and the House of Representatives holds the purse strings.

In the pending Army bill, nothing is proposed but to strike out a single clause forbidding the presence of troops at the polls. In no respect is the authority of the President to answer a call to repel invasion, or to suppress insurrection, in any way abridged. The amendment is germane to the bill, and is simply a condition as to the use of the Army, which the people's representatives had a perfect right to impose. It is not in any proper sense general legislation, and if it was, the statute-books are full of precedents that the friends of the present measure might cite against their opponents.

Whether the clause in question ought to be repealed is a fair subject for discussion, but the form of presenting it is not liable to just criticism. Personally, I should have preferred to vote on the proposition as an independent bill, because the practice of both parties of legislating on appropriation bills is more to be honored in the breach than in the observance. If this course had been pursued it is probable the whole debate would have been less acrimonious, and the excitement which has followed it could never have been worked up to so high a pitch.

It has been alleged that there is an attempt to coerce the Executive in this bill. Certainly none appears on the surface, and he is left entirely free to exercise his own judgment if it should be sent to him in the present or in a modified form. To assume that he will approve or will veto it, or to introduce him in any way into this debate, is a departure from wise usage. The President's sphere of action is defined by the Constitution, and any attempt to influence legislation by suggestions of what he may or may not do, is an obtrusion deserving rebuke.

It will be time enough to criticise the act of the President when he shall have exercised his constitutional right, and any discussion of his supposed course before then is wholly out of place in this body. Let us hope, Mr. President, when this bill has passed from our hands that the angry debate which has attended it will operate as electricity does in purifying the atmosphere, and that we will all come together better disposed to give to the country what has been given to party, in a united effort to provide relief for the prevailing distress in every pursuit of life.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

Mr. LOGAN. Before the Senator from Iowa proceeds I should like to ask my colleague a question, as I misunderstood him, I think, in one remark that he made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. ALLISON. I yield for a moment.

Mr. LOGAN. Just for a moment. Without wishing to enter into any discussion or controversy with my colleague, I desire to know if I misunderstood him in a remark he made in regard to the obedience that is given to the laws by the citizens of the South and the North? I understood him to say that the laws are now obeyed alike in the North and South.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. So I understand; I understand that the laws are obeyed; the Federal laws, I mean.

Mr. LOGAN. I am speaking of the Federal laws. I do not desire to enter into a discussion, but inasmuch as we both represent the same constituency and so that our constituents may not be led astray in their views as to the facts in regard to obedience to the laws by the statement of my honorable colleague, I wish to say that I find in the annual report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for 1878 a table of seizures made of illicit distilleries during that year. The number that year is twelve hundred and fifty-eight. In all the Northern States, containing twenty-five million people, the seizures were sixty-seven. Deduct sixty-seven from twelve hundred and fifty-eight, and eleven hundred and ninety-one more seizures were made in the sixteen Southern States, where there are fourteen million people, than were made in the Northern States.

Again, as my colleague referred to submission to and compliance with the national law, the number of arrests of persons in the whole United States made for violation of the laws of the United States alone in reference to the internal revenues of the United States was twenty-nine hundred and ninety; in the Northern States fifty-five; in the Southern States twenty-nine hundred and thirty-five more than in the Northern States. The number of persons killed in arresting violators of the laws of the United States in the United States within the last year was five. Where were the arrests made? All five in the Southern States. The number of persons wounded in the execution of the national laws under the internal-revenue system of this country was thirteen, all in the Southern States.

Now, let me recapitulate. In the Southern States, in the midst of fourteen million people, there have been eleven hundred and ninety-one violations of law more in the Southern than in the Northern States. In the arrests there have been twenty-nine hundred and thirty-five more in the Southern than in the Northern States. The murders committed in the execution of the laws were all in the Southern States. The persons wounded in the execution of the laws were all in the Southern States.

I merely put this table before the country to show that my colleague's statement is not correct; and that is all, Mr. President.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. There may be more whisky thieves in the South than there are in the North. In the Northern States smuggling is going on. In my own State unlawful distilling is going on. There may be more persons in the South who are engaged in this class of business than there are in Illinois and other Northern States; but I am not aware that that has anything to do with the sort of laws that I spoke of as being obeyed.

Mr. LOGAN. My colleague said that the national laws were alike obeyed in the North and in the South. These are the national laws of which I speak, and they are not alike obeyed in the North and the South.

Mr. WITHERS. In that connection I wish to say a word.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Wait a moment. There may be more effort made to arrest the whisky thieves in the South than in the North.

Mr. WITHERS. That was what I was going to suggest.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I do not know anything about it; but there are plenty of such offenders both in the North and in the South; the violation of the internal-revenue laws is going on all over the country. There may be a greater proportion of men who are prosecuted down there than there are in the North; I know nothing about that. But that is a very small matter. I was speaking of obedience to the general law of the land. The criminal law of this country of course may be disobeyed by individuals; but the community is not disobeying it at all.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. GORDON. Will the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. LOGAN. As soon as I make a reply to my colleague I will hear the Senator from Georgia. The answer I do not think is sufficient, at least it is not satisfactory to me, to say that there are plenty of men who violate the law, North and South. I put the question to my colleague whether he can show where a solitary murder of a revenue officer attempting to execute the national laws as to internal revenue or on any other subject has been committed in the North, or where a man has been wounded in the North in attempting to execute the laws of this Government against the citizen who violates them. The question is not whether there are criminals both North and South. That is the case, of course. The question is whether the laws are alike obeyed, respected, and submitted to in the North and in the South, and the records of the country show this not to be the case. Now I will hear my honorable friend from Georgia.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. My colleague is determined to have the last word on this subject, I see. I do not know whether the criminal laws are obeyed as well in the South as in the North or not. My general impression is that in regard to the distillation of whisky, in the mountains of Tennessee and in some other States there is a greater violation of the internal-revenue laws of the country in the South than elsewhere; but when you speak of the great Federal system of this country, it is obeyed and allegiance is given in the South as well as in the North. I adhere to what I said.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I have been moved on several occasions to make some remarks upon this bill, but this morning I yielded to the Senator from Arkansas and my honored neighbor from Illinois as they desired to speak in the time that I should have occupied if I had then proceeded to address the Senate.

Either the Senator from Illinois who has just taken his seat [Mr. DAVIS] and most of the other Senators who have discussed the question on the side of the Chamber usually known as the democratic side have totally misapprehended the questions involved in this debate, or I have no comprehension myself of the questions involved. Is it possible that we are sitting here day after day, hour after hour, to debate whether in a republic there shall be a free and an honest ballot? Is there any party in this country arrayed against a principle so well grounded in our governmental history? If there is such a party, it is not the republican party.

What is the real question before us to-day, Mr. President? First, what is the bill before us? It is professedly an appropriation bill providing for the Army of the United States from the 1st day of July next for one year. Unless this bill shall pass before the 1st day of July, then all the usual uses to which an army is applied must be stopped or they must go on without the necessary appropriations.

Is an army in this country necessary? It seems to me experience shows that it is necessary for the preservation of peace upon our borders, for the protection of our forts and arsenals and all public property, and above all it is the only protection we have this day in this capital for our treasure, our archives, and all the forces of government that are concentrated here, against organized resistance that may at any time appear in this capital.

This is no new arm of our Government. I listened to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] the other day quoting from Jefferson the opinion that Government could be protected by a well-organized militia. That was not the opinion of the framers of our Government or of Mr. Jefferson. The Army of the United States is as old as the Government itself. The seventh act of the First Congress of the United States was an act to organize the Army and the Department of War. It has continued from that day to this as one of the ordinary and efficient means for the general purposes of our Government and as one of the great forces in it. As early as Jefferson, who was quoted by the Senator from Kentucky, and under his first administration in 1802, a military school was established at West Point, which has continued from that day to this to educate the sons of our country and from every portion of our country by provision of law.

This school for the training of our young men in the art of war has always been regarded as essential to the efficiency of our Army, and has been sustained by liberal appropriations.

Appropriation bills for the support of the Army have been independent of other appropriation bills since the year 1800. The bill before us is the regular appropriation bill that has been enacted into statute law and found a place upon our statute-books for each successive year without variation since the year 1800. For what purpose is it enacted? It is to supply, among other things, the pay of the officers of our Army, who are in office presumably, under the statute, for life. It is further to provide for the pay of the retired officers of our Army to whom we have stipulated to give three-quarters pay during their lives; retired because of wounds in battle or because of long and faithful service. It is for the clothing, subsistence, and pay of the soldiers of the Republic who have enlisted, under our laws, for a period of five years. I hear it stated (and of course the Constitution is quoted to show) that appropriations for the Army cannot exceed a period of two years. This is true, but our laws require that every soldier in the Army of the United States shall be enlisted for five years, and when enlisted he is compelled to take an oath that he will obey the rules and articles of war, one of which is that if he deserts from the Army he shall in time of war suffer death, and in time of peace any penalty a court-martial shall impose less than death. Yet we propose by withholding supplies from them, unless they are given on conditions of which I shall speak presently, that these soldiers of the Army, four-fifths of whom have yet to serve for periods of more than two years, shall not receive the compensation provided by law, nor shall they receive clothing or subsistence. And the law says, although they are not thus provided for, yet if they desert they may be punished as a court-martial may direct with any penalty less than death.

Now it is proposed that these necessary appropriations shall not be made unless laws are changed to suit the majority in this Chamber and in the House of Representatives.

From the beginning of this discussion Senators on the democratic side of the Chamber insist that the sixth section of this bill is put here for the purpose of redressing grievances; that there is a present impending grievance which must be redressed now and here and on this bill. I believe the honorable Senator from Ohio who now so acceptably occupies the chair [Mr. THURMAN] first invented in this Chamber, in a former debate at the close of the last session, the expression that this was a "redress of grievances," and he illustrated his view on this subject by the statement that under our written Constitution it rested with the House of Representatives to refuse appropriations unless the Senate would consent to put upon the appropriation bills such legislation as the House asked of us. So we have heard from that time till now that this sixth section is inserted to provide for a redress of grievances.

When were these two sections now sought to be modified discovered to be grievances? The democratic party has been in power in the House of Representatives since March, 1875. I challenge successful contradiction when I say that no petition has been presented in that House or in this Chamber from any citizen of the United States by any member of the House or any Senator on this floor since 1875 asking for a repeal or a modification of these sections under debate. There has been a strong, and I am sorry to say a growing, minority on the democratic side in this Chamber since that time, and yet no Senator has risen in his place to present such a measure, although he could do so any morning. Among the ten thousand bills that have been presented in this Chamber in that time no one has proposed amendments to the sections now sought to be repealed or modified and sent the proposed amendments to the appropriate constituted committee of this body, either the Committee on Military Affairs or the Committee on the Judiciary. Has that been done? If not, why not? Because they were not regarded as grievances to be redressed.

The question of the use of troops in various ways in the different States, or the general question of the use of the Army and its organization, has been constantly in debate in this Chamber for many years. In 1876 the democratic House of Representatives, upon their return to power in the House, placed on the Army bill a number of sections providing for the reorganization and reduction of the Army. It seems curious and worthy of note here that the Army appropriation bill ever since the democrats have come into power has been an object of dispute and discussion between the House and the Senate. In 1876 the regular Army appropriation bill had placed upon it a provision for the reorganization and reduction of the Army, reducing the number of the regiments and reducing the total number of soldiers in the field. Did anybody in the House of Representatives propose then on that bill a redress of grievances in this regard? There had just been an election in 1874 in every State of this Union for Representatives in Congress. No complaint was made and no proposition was made in the House for a redress of grievances with reference to the question of the use of the Army "to keep the peace at the polls." That bill came to the Senate and the Senate rejected the provisions reorganizing the Army. The House refused to assent to the bill unless we would agree to provide a commission that should take into consideration the reorganization of the Army. Finally, I believe at the very last hour, or nearly the last hours of the first session, the Senate agreed to what the democrats in the other House insisted as a condition of making appropriations, that there should be a commission on the reorganization of the Army, which should report at the next session on that subject. That was the "grievance" to be redressed then.

What followed that, Mr. President? Here I wish the attention of my friend from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] because he has singularly misread the history of the several provisions with reference to the use of the Army that have been placed upon the Army appropriation bills. The session of 1876–'77 came, the second session of a Congress with a democratic majority in the House of Representatives. What did they propose then? Did they propose then this great measure of "liberty" that is proposed now? This monstrous grievance was not thought of by any Senator or by any Representative. They proposed then that the troops should not be used for what purpose? For the purpose of maintaining a State government in the State of Louisiana obnoxious to them, and they persisted in that until the end of the second session of the Forty-fourth Congress. The Army bill failed because the Senate of the United States would not agree that the President of the United States should be interfered with in his constitutional right to recognize the person he might regard as the proper executive of a State. There was no question about the posse comitatus clause in that bill; it was not even suggested in either House. I wish to call the attention of the Senate now to that Army bill, because my friend from Delaware yesterday, when I interrupted him, stated that I wholly mistook, or at least it was his impression that I mistook, the provision. I have the bill here. This provision is found in the printed bill H. R. No. 4691 of the second session of the Forty-fourth Congress. There is no intimation in it in reference to the posse comitatus clause. That question was not debated in the House or in this Chamber at that time; it was not a question of difference between the two Houses; and the question relative to the establishment of a State government, so far from being surrendered by the Senate of the United States, was absolutely surrendered by the House of Representatives at the extra session which met in October, 1877. They reported early in the extra session an Army bill pure and simple, and it passed the Senate without opposition, so that the provisions which killed the Army bill in the second session of the Forty-fourth Congress were not renewed by the House of Representatives in the Forty-fifth Congress.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I am inclined to think the honorable Senator from Iowa is more correct than I was yesterday in the history of the Army bill brought in from the House in the spring of 1877. I had collected, as I thought, all those bills, but in coming into the Chamber I found in the many papers handed to me that the were mislaid, and I spoke, and said that I spoke, from recollection only. The Senator is historically right in saying that the difference between the two Houses of Congress in the spring of 1877 which caused the failure of the Army bill at that session, was because of the insistence on the part of the House that the President of the United States should not use the Army to sustain a pretended State government, as we considered it, in the State of Louisiana. On that account the Senate suffered the bill to fall. I believe the Senator is correct; that was the point of difference. Then I stated exactly what he has said, that upon the reconvention of Congress the House with great promptness sent in here a bill to pay the officers and men of the Army that which had been withheld from them since the 30th of June, and that bill the Senate accepted. Then I went further to say that the bill of 1878 which passed and was approved on the 18th of June, did contain the posse comitatus clause, which was an act so-called of general legislation; it was an act proposed by the democrats and approved by the republicans; it came from the House and was objected to here by the majority to which my honorable friend belongs. I cited that bill because it contained a feature of general legislation so much more open to discussion and possible objection than the one contained in the present bill. I hope that I do my honorable friend the justice to state that he was right and that I was not right yesterday in the history I gave of the act of 1877; but he will perceive that my object in referring to it was simply to show that there had been an act of general legislation, even more general than the one now proposed, accepted by the Senate in the Army appropriation bill of 1878.

Mr. ALLISON. I trust I shall not spend a great deal of time in the discussion of the question whether it is the practice to place upon appropriation bills matters of legislation. That, of course, has been the practice more or less since I have been in this Chamber, and before I came into it. That is not the question under consideration. I am undertaking to give a history of these appropriation bills for a totally different purpose, of course, from that of the Senator from Delaware. I am undertaking to show that this "grievance" is a suddenly discovered grievance, and that it has no foundation in public opinion as expressed at any election and reflected through any of these prior bills for being pressed now upon the Senate. So the Senator from Delaware truly says the posse comitatus clause was put on the bill of 1878.

Mr. BAYARD. May I correct myself? I want to say further in regard to the contested feature of the act of 1877, that the reason why in the fall of that year the democratic House sent in the bill containing the full supply for the Army was that all they had contended for in regard to the employment of the Army in Louisiana had been accomplished.

Mr. ALLISON. Why was the posse comitatus clause, so called, put upon the bill in 1878, and not these provisions? Can any Senator answer me that question? The posse comitatus clause agreed to by the Senate in 1878 was not originally reported with the Army bill. I have been told that even that was the subject of a caucus in the other branch of Congress. I know that it was reported from the Judiciary Committee of the House and not from the Committee on Appropriations. It was reported by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. If this grievance existed then, why is it that the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives in 1878, a majority of whom were democrats, had not discovered it and presented it also with this posse comitatus clause?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Is the Senator willing to vote for the repeal of the law which authorizes the troops to be used to keep the peace at the polls? Does the Senator think that law ought to be repealed?

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Georgia is only endeavoring to get in the beginning of my remarks what I mean to say before I conclude. If he will wait until I have progressed somewhat further he will understand what I am willing to do with reference to this particular clause about which he is now asking me. I am undertaking to show that this grievance which is now made the reason for the hot haste and pressure of this matter upon an appropriation bill at the beginning of a Congress and not at the end of it is born of political excitement and political strife, created in Congress and not out of it, and that it does not rest upon any real grievance. That is what I am endeavoring to show.

In 1878 the Judiciary Committee of the House proposed an amendment to the Army appropriation bill, preventing the use of the Army as a posse comitatus. I want to read from that section:

> From and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful to employ any part of the Army of the United States as a posse comitatus, or otherwise, under the pretext or for the purpose of executing the laws, except in such cases and under such circumstances as such employment of said force may be expressly authorized by act of Congress.

There, so far from making a proposal to repeal this provision, they substantially re-enacted the provision embodied in section 5528 of the Revised Statutes, because they inhibited the use of the Army except where it was expressly provided for by law, as it is provided for by law in section 5528 of the Revised Statutes. Therefore the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, after careful consideration in 1878, not only failed to provide for a repeal of these sections or a modification of them, but in substance re-enacted them, and this grievance, of which we hear so much now, could not have existed then. That twenty-ninth section of the appropriation bill of 1878 came to the Senate. The Senate did not refuse to agree to it, but agreed to the section as proposed by the House of Representatives with a modification. That modification was material, it is true. Afterward the whole question went to a committee of conference, and now the law stands so that the Army cannot be used as a posse comitatus except where it is expressly authorized to be used by law. Therefore there is no parallel whatever in the two provisions. The posse comitatus clause, which we agreed to last year, expressly reserves the right to use the Army where the law authorizes its use, as in the case of section 5528, and it may be said very truthfully that that law was re-enacted.

But it was not discovered that this law ought to be repealed until February last. The Army bill introduced in the House of Representatives on the 23d of January, 1879, made no provision for a repeal of this law or a modification of it, and it was not moved in the House of Representatives until after a democratic caucus had sat upon the question on the 2d of February, 1879, when it was put on as a rider in the House of Representatives and persisted in to the end as a condition on which the moneys for the Army should be appropriated. Of course the time was short in the Senate. The Senator from Delaware says that provision was disagreed to without debate in this Chamber. Why? Because these two bills, the legislative, executive, and judicial bill and the Army bill came in here practically together, and all within eight or twelve hours of the expiration of the last Congress. The debate happened to occur on the legislative, executive, and judicial bill, as Senators will remember, and therefore there was no time to debate this bill. But it does not change the fact that the House of Representatives through its conferees absolutely refused to pass appropriations for the Army unless we would agree to this new legislation.

I object, however, to this legislation being put upon this Army appropriation bill for another reason. We are now in the beginning of a Congress. There is no necessity for pressing this legislation upon an appropriation bill. Whatever these questions are, they are political questions, are they not? Whatever there is involved in this discussion is political. It is political in the sense that it divides the two great parties in this country, the republicans and the democrats. The democratic party chances now to have a small majority in the House of Representatives; it has on this floor a clear majority; but I think I do not misstate the fact when I say that in this country the republican party has a majority of all the voters in it if there is what gentlemen talk so much about, a free ballot and an honest ballot in every part of it. Therefore I say it is not treating fairly one-half the people of this country to press upon an appropriation bill as a condition of the support of the Army a measure which has never been debated in the country. Especially is that so when the people of this country in the twenty-one States north of Mason and Dixon's line are particularly sensitive about this character of legislation. Especially ought this not to be done now when this measure affects or may affect the lately enfranchised race in this country, and when thirty-two Senators, making up the democratic majority, come here from States largely populated by people recently enfranchised by the constitutional amendments whose rights are more or less affected by the proposed change. Of the forty-two Senators on the democratic side of this House to-day there are thirty-two from States more or less affected by the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution, and which amendments are involved in this measure. I ask Senators who thus represent such constituencies if they consider it a fair and bold and manly way of securing legislation to place the regular appropriation bills in a condition where they will not be passed unless we agree and the President agrees to legislation which a majority, or at least one-half the people of this country, are of opinion ought not to pass? Is that fair legislation? Is it not a menace to the President who represents all the people to say to him that necessary appropriations shall not be made unless he agrees to provisions which may affect injuriously the rights of citizens recently enfranchised by the fifteenth amendment?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. May I ask my friend a question? Do I understand him to say that a majority of the people of this country or even one-half of the people of this country think it right to use the Army to keep the peace at the polls?

Mr. ALLISON. By no means; I am not saying that just at this moment; I am saying that you propose legislation here, and I will endeavor to show what that legislation is after a little—legislation which may interfere with the rights of the lately enfranchised race; and the people, and more than a majority of them, are sensitive upon that subject and mean that it shall not be done; and I say it is not a manly way to put it, to force it upon an appropriation bill and practically proclaim "take that or destroy your Army," and still less is it proper legislation when twenty-three members of this majority are men who were in one way and another engaged in the rebellion, and who are on record as against these amendments to the Constitution which are so cherished by the people who put down the rebellion. That is the reason why I say, as a measure of justice and fair legislation, it is not right to put these political riders upon an appropriation bill, especially so as they have never been discussed, they have never been debated before the people in the North or the South. The questions involved in this section of the pending bill have never been discussed at the hustings pending a general election. No petitions have come here for a repeal; no remonstrances have come here against the use of the Army as provided in the sections which it is proposed to repeal or modify; and therefore I say that it is not a fair and manly way of legislation to press it here and now upon an appropriation bill, and much less is it so when it is boldly avowed not only by the circumstances of the case which I have already related, but by nearly every Senator who has debated this subject, that these sections are placed on the bills as a condition of the appropriation of money for purposes provided for by law. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] clearly made this statement, or else I misapprehend his language.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Allow me to ask the Senator, by his permission, whether the merit of a bill is to be judged by what the bill itself says, or by what somebody says about it?

Mr. ALLISON. The merit of a bill and the provisions of a bill are to be expounded and understood by what is said by the great men who expound and interpret their meaning and purpose, and what will be done with the measure if not assented to elsewhere. The purposes of a party are known, not always by what happens to appear on the face of a bill, but by what happens to be said here and occur here and there and elsewhere.

The Senator from Pennsylvania now in my eye [Mr. WALLACE] made a long speech in the beginning of the debate on this very question, and in that speech—I will not stop to quote his language—he said that it was the constitutional right of the Executive to veto this bill, but that it was the constitutional right also of both Houses of Congress to fail to act in case he did veto it; and he went further and said that it was the constitutional duty of the Senate to refuse to act. That is the substance of the language of the Senator from Pennsylvania. What does that mean?

Mr. WALLACE. Will the Senator permit me a word of explanation?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. WALLACE. What I said was this, and I repeat it: it is the power of the legislative branch to decline to act; and where it involves a great civil right, one of the liberties of the people, it becomes the duty of the legislative branch to decline to act.

Mr. ALLISON. And this is that case according to the view of the Senator from Pennsylvania; and therefore the Senator now but reiterates what he stated before, namely, that it is within the province of this Senate and the House of Representatives, in case the President in the exercise of his independent constitutional power shall believe that these riders put on this bill are not such as should be passed, are not promotive of the public welfare, but the reverse, for a majority of the Senate and House to say to him, "You shall have no appropriation to pay the soldiers of the Republic engaged in its defense, although they have enlisted for five years, and although they can be incarcerated and punished for desertion, unless these measures thus obnoxious shall accompany the bill." The Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Pennsylvania were in accord upon this question. I do not need to go very far to find out what is proposed, nor does the President. If these things and these statements, authoritatively made as they are on this floor, are not menaces to him, then I fail to understand the force of the English language.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. RANDOLPH] spoke the other day. I do not now see him in his seat, but he stated the question involved perhaps with more precision even than the Senator from Pennsylvania, and I want to read what he said:

> The question presented in a simple form is this: as a condition of granting supplies to the Army, has Congress a right to demand a redress of what a majority of its members deem "grievances" concerning its use?

This majority is to judge of the grievance and withhold supplies unless the conditions are complied with.

"As a condition." That is the language of Senators on this floor to the President of the United States used in open debate. Are not these words of menace to the President? I agree with every word uttered by the Senator from Delaware yesterday as to the independence of the Executive over either or both Houses of Congress.

Mr. BAYARD. And the independence of the Houses of Congress?

Mr. ALLISON. I believe in the independence of both, but I want to ask the Senator from Delaware, as he puts that question to me, whether, believing that there are three great co-ordinate departments or branches of the Government, each having authority to act with reference to the particular things submitted to it, and each being independent of the other, and the concurrence of all being necessary, he would consider it fair legislation, or even constitutional legislation, within the spirit of the Constitution, for one co-ordinate branch to coerce the other? And yet that is what is proposed here. The President of the United States has one-sixth of the legislative power of this Government deposited with him by the Constitution. If he chooses to veto this bill because it contains certain provisions which in his judgment are unwise and in derogation of the constitutional rights of the citizen, are we permitted to say in the fair exercise of our constitutional power that we will not appropriate money which the laws of the land declare shall be appropriated unless he abandons his judgment and agrees with us? That is the question.

Mr. BAYARD. What law of the land?

Mr. ALLISON. Our laws provide for an army officered by men appointed by fair intendment for life, with soldiers enlisted for five years. Can it be possible that we are not required, in the fair exercise of our constitutional duty here, to appropriate money for the support of this Army? Certainly we are unless the constitutional form which requires two-thirds to override the veto of the President be set aside.

But now, sir, what is the issue presented here? Is it simply that troops shall not be at the polls for the purpose of interfering with and controlling elections? Does any Senator say that troops may be used at the polls for the purpose of interfering with and controlling elections? I know of no Senator on this floor who believes in a doctrine of that sort. What is the issue? The issue as presented is not alone what troops may lawfully do, but whether or not the power of the Government of the United States shall in any event be exercised at elections for any purpose whatever. This statute we have been discussing is a criminal statute; it is a penal statute, and I undertake to say here now, in repetition of what is understood to have been said by the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] the other day, that, since 1870 at least, there has not been found a United States soldier at any polling place in the United States.

Mr. WITHERS. In 1876 they were in Petersburgh.

Mr. ALLISON. At a polling place?

Mr. WITHERS. Immediately contiguous to it.

Mr. ALLISON. How near it?

Mr. WITHERS. Within half a square, or thereabouts.

Mr. ALLISON. Then they were not there for the purpose contemplated in this statute?

Mr. WITHERS. That was the avowed purpose.

Mr. ALLISON. Avowed? Avowed by whom?

Mr. WITHERS. By the parties who applied for them and by the President who sent them.

Mr. ALLISON. Then, do I understand the Senator from Virginia to say that those troops were there at a time when there was no riot or disturbance?

Mr. WITHERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. Then, I submit to him that under the statute every officer there was liable to indictment and punishment by fine of $5,000 or imprisonment in the penitentiary, or both.

Mr. WITHERS. That may all be true, but when I introduced a resolution in the Senate to inquire into the cause of it, there was no allegation made that there was any breach of the peace, but it was feared a breach of the peace might occur.

Mr. ALLISON. Nor was there any allegation that those troops were at the polls; they were not at the polls; there was no pretense of it. I am not quite familiar now with all the facts, but I listened to the Senator then, and I made up my mind then, as I am clear now, that that was not a case within the provisions of this statute at all. There was an apparent necessity for troops in that locality and the troops were sent there, and if I mistake not they were expressly ordered not to appear at the polling places unless riots and disturbances should occur, and if they did so appear they appeared in violation of this statute, and therefore were liable to be fined and otherwise punished.

Mr. WITHERS. I will say, with the permission of my friend, that those troops were sent to Petersburgh in advance of the election, the day before the election; and upon a resolution of inquiry being addressed to the President as to the reason why they were sent there and the necessity for their presence at the election at the polls, he transmitted a letter from the Attorney-General stating that he had received information from the district attorney that there was a probability that the peace might be disturbed on the day of election, and applying for troops, and he sent them in consequence of that requisition.

Mr. ALLISON. And they were there within the statute, and of course were not punished for its violation.

Mr. WITHERS. Certainly not; but there was no riot, no disturbance, and had not been any for a long time previously.

Mr. ALLISON. Then of course these troops were not at the polls. Senators do not seem to draw the distinction which I undertake to make here, and that is that this is a penal statute; and if the polling places are interfered with and men are intimidated or are refused the opportunity to vote by means of the troops, the officers in charge are punished with imprisonment and with heavy fines, and they appear at the peril of punishment for a violation of this penal statute.

Mr. WITHERS. I will merely repeat that the governor of the State issued a proclamation protesting against this invasion, avowing his perfect willingness and power to preserve the peace within the State.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly; and that brings me to the very point. I am much obliged to the Senator for stating the true question. That is the very question involved in this controversy. The one side insist that the Government of the United States shall be a stranger and an alien in the States, and that the State authorities alone shall conduct elections in their own way, and that the Government of the United States shall not put into force the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution, which clearly authorizes it to make rules, regulations, and laws in reference to the election of Senators and Representatives to Congress.

Mr. WITHERS. We only insist that the fourth section of the fourth article shall be observed.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the real issue in this case; it is that there can be no peace at the polls to protect by means of the authority or forces of the United States, whatever they are, civil or military.

Mr. President, this bill, although it is simply, as has been so often stated here, a repealing statute, contains much more than the repeal of a single clause in section 2002 and section 5528 of the Revised Statutes. We must consider in connection with it the posse comitatus clause quoted by the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Pennsylvania, the other day, which we agreed to last year, and which is now the law of the land. That posse comitatus provision says that the Army of the United States shall not be used as a posse comitatus except in cases expressly provided for by law or by the Constitution. Therefore, of course, if this provision is repealed, the marshals and other officers of the Government executing the laws of the United States cannot use the military power, because they will be inhibited by this modified section. But that is not all. The Senator from Maine called attention to the language of this section—and I am only repeating what he said the other day—this section provides that no military or naval officer or other person engaged in the civil, military or naval service of the United States shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control any troops or armed men at any place, &c.

This provision, if it is allowed to stand, with the posse comitatus clause also standing, makes it impossible for any marshal of the United States to have at any election place or anywhere else an armed man to protect the rights of the United States or citizens of the United States at the polls, a right guaranteed by the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution. Therefore when Senators say that the issue here is between keeping the troops at the polls to suppress riot, or tumult, or turbulence, and keeping them away from the polls wholly, they do not present the real issue. Under the disguise of a simple repeal, it is proposed here to tie the hands of every marshal of the United States, and every officer of the United States on election day, and say that he shall not use an armed force for any purpose on election day, that the armed force on election day, whatever may be the provocation or necessity, shall be under the control wholly of the sheriffs and the constables and the local police, although members of Congress are to be elected, and the State authorities may wholly fail to protect the citizen in his right to vote. Senators may be able to maintain that issue before the people of this country, but I do not believe the people will consent that the election laws for the protection of the citizen at national elections which we now have standing on our statute-book, and which authorize the Government of the United States to witness and in specified instances to supervise elections on the days when members of Congress are elected in order that the right of a free and honest ballot shall be secured to every citizen, shall be repealed and that the election of members of Congress shall be hereafter wholly under the control of the State authorities without interference or control of the Government of the United States. We have had in the recent past too many examples of the necessity for this interference and supervision. We have had these examples in southern States and in northern States, and in the great cities of this country particularly.

The Senator from Delaware yesterday read the orders issued in 1870 with reference to troops to be held in New York City on the day when members of Congress were to be elected in that year. I listened very carefully to the reading of those orders. I found not one word in them which would justify the statement that those troops were to be used at the polls to interfere in the slightest degree with the free and honest exercise of the ballot in that city. I also remembered, however, as he was reading those orders the circumstances and facts which led up to them. I remembered that in 1868 John T. Hoffman was supposed to have been elected governor of the State of New York by means of fraudulent transactions in the city of New York, by which 60,000 fraudulent votes were polled, and that it was conceded in testimony taken before a congressional committee that men voted from one to forty times at several polling places in the city of New York. That was in 1868, and in 1870 our Federal election laws were passed, chiefly because of the frauds that had been committed on the ballot in the State of New York in that year, by which not only Governor Hoffman was elected, but the electoral vote of the State was cast for the party engaged in the frauds and against the fairly expressed will of the people. The discussions in Congress which followed that investigation led to the passage of the election laws now on our statutes.

Now, it is proposed by the repeal of these provisions that should another exigency arise similar to that in that great city on election day no Federal official shall exercise any power whatever in the city of New York, because no marshal can exercise any power if this section 6 is enacted, no matter what may be done with the election laws which are soon to come before us. If you tie the hands of the marshal so that he can exert no authority at the polls when members of Congress are to be elected, then your election laws may be permitted to stand or fall; it makes very little difference which. Upon this simple repeal, then, of these eight words, as we are told is all that is proposed, connected as they are with the other statute, depends the efficiency and efficacy of the whole system of elections, as provided now in the Revised Statutes.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the honorable Senator a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand the honorable Senator to say that the effect of adopting the present provision will be to repeal the power of a civil officer to serve process at the polls, no matter for the breach of what law of the United States? Mr. President, that surely is an erroneous statement. Until 1865 there had been no law of the United States that would have warranted the use of the Army at the polls, and I mean to say that the only effect of this amendment is that no marshal of the United States and no civil officer of the United States and no military officer of the United States shall bring the Army to the polls at the time of an election. Does that prevent the posse comitatus from being summoned? Does that interfere with all the powers the marshals have?

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BAYARD. It does not affect them in the least.

Mr. ALLISON. Allow me to tell the Senator how it does.

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. This provision says that no armed men shall be brought or used by any civil officer at the polls. The marshals of the United States to-day, by a law passed in 1807 under Thomas Jefferson, may in their proper sphere exert the powers of the sheriff of a county. The sheriff of a county can call the bystanders and the posse comitatus. Those bystanders are of no use unless they are armed. Here there is an inhibition on the marshal if he undertakes to call the bystanders to assist him in case of a riot on election day in the city of New York, is there not?

Mr. BAYARD. The issue raised is a perfectly plain and simple one. I do not stand on the words "Army of the United States." As I said yesterday it matters not to me if it is the army of a State; it is the question of armed force as opposed to free will; and it is only on that occasion and at that time when the free will of the people must be exhibited or else it might be silenced to death for the rest of the year, that I do object and stand upon the principle that you may not either by a civil officer or by a military officer obtrude an armed force on the peaceful deliberations of the people.

Mr. ALLISON. But suppose an armed mob is there; and unless I am very much mistaken the testimony taken by the Teller committee discloses that armed forces were brought right up to the election polls in some of the voting precincts in South Carolina at the last election, and men were driven away by these armed mobs: do I understand the Senator from Delaware to say that there shall be no power in the United States in such a case to use authorized armed force against unauthorized armed force and protect and preserve the electors and the honest effort of men to cast votes at such elections? Do I understand him to hold that?

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, such occurrences as the Senator has described would simply make the election a farce and make it void. Who is to judge of that? Where has the Constitution placed the power and what tribunal has it created? Each House is the judge of the elections and returns of its own members; and if such facts came up from the States in this country that any armed force, I would say whether the armed force of the United States or of a State or of a mob led there by anybody thus intervened, it would invalidate that election and make it void. There is the cure for it; it is that if men will resort to such dishonest outrages as the Senator has depicted they shall gain nothing by them; that when such farces and outrages shall come here in the name of elections, the House of Congress appropriate to consider it will declare it to be null and of no effect. That is the mode by which we are to meet such wrong and outrage.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MORRILL in the chair.) Does the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. ALLISON. Allow me a moment; I wish to say a word first to the Senator from Delaware. The difference between the Senator from Delaware and myself is this: he says that he will allow this question to be decided in the House of Representatives after the elections have taken place and the wrong has been done, which House is the judge of the elections and qualifications of its members. We say that under the Constitution of the United States, the fourth section of the first article, it is the duty of Congress when these things are occurring year after, to provide for an honest and a fair election at every poll where a Congressman is to be elected, and that the men of all the States shall be represented on the floor of the House, and not leave the whole matter to an election committee which may or not report until the very closing hours of Congress.

Mr. BAYARD. And the Army of the United States to determine!

Mr. ALLISON. No; I am not now speaking of the Army of the United States. I am speaking of the exertion of physical force by the civil officers of the United States under authority of law, which they have now, but which it is proposed by this section to strike down, in order that when the other bill comes here the election laws may be ineffectual. Now, I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not catch the language of the Senator from Iowa in reference to South Carolina. I should be very glad if he would repeat what he said on that subject as to armed men at the last election of 1878. I should be obliged to the honorable Senator if he would state where there was any force of armed men at the polls in 1878 in South Carolina.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me, I will state——

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly; I only referred to it.

Mr. TELLER. The reference made by the Senator from Iowa is to an occurrence in Louisiana, not in South Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I understand the Senator withdraws his language as to South Carolina.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not of course impute to South Carolina what did not occur there.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I have nothing to say.

Mr. ALLISON. And if I did use the word "South Carolina" I did so inadvertently, not having the book before me; but I call the attention of the Senator from Colorado for a moment to the fact that I was referring to the testimony taken by his committee.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Colorado state at what place in Louisiana bodies of armed men appeared at the polls?

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from Iowa will yield to me a moment, I will state for the benefit of the Senator from Tennessee, who was on the committee and must have forgotten it. The testimony shows that in a parish in the upper part of the State of Louisiana, after a number of colored people had traveled a distance variously estimated at from thirty to forty miles to vote and had deposited their votes to the extent of two hundred and seventy, immediately after the votes were in and during the day and before the time for closing the polls, an armed body of men numbering sixteen or twenty, most of the voters having left the polls, came down there, broke up the ballot-box, and destroyed the ballots.

Mr. BAILEY. My recollection is that the statement was upon rumor, that after the voting had been concluded and when the officers were carrying the ballot-box to some other point, it was said that the ballot-box was captured.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator refers to another case.

Mr. BAILEY. It was not while the election was in progress.

Mr. TELLER. The evidence shows in the case that I referred to that during the same day and before the canvass was completed they came down, as I recollect it. The case referred to by the Senator from Tennessee, where they were carrying a box, was in another parish, at another time. This is shown by the testimony of some witnesses, as well as the report of the supervisor of the election. It can be found in the report made by the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not intend to allude to special instances nor to discuss the details of the occurrences at the last election reported upon by the Teller committee. I leave that discussion to others more familiar with it, as I have not had time to examine the testimony with care. I was only undertaking to illustrate what can take place, if this law should be modified as is now proposed, by what has taken place in some of the States. Here let me say that in my judgment there are several things essential in order to secure a free ballot, and the Senator from Colorado has just stated one of them, and that is that people who are to vote shall have an opportunity of going to convenient polling places and there casting their votes. Is that true in South Carolina even now? I say to my friend from South Carolina that, as I understand it, the election districts were diminished largely last year in South Carolina so that great numbers of people are compelled to go to a single polling place in order to cast their votes, and oftentimes to a great distance in that State and in other States in the South.

Mr. BUTLER. In 1875 the polling places in South Carolina were largely increased in order to enable repeating to be done in Charleston County. That is the fact in reference to Charleston County. In 1875 the voting precincts in Charleston County were increased for the specific purpose of enabling voters to repeat, and in 1877 those precincts were changed, and I undertake to say that there is the amplest opportunity for every voter in Charleston County to cast his vote without the slightest molestation.

Mr. TELLER. With the permission of the Senator from Iowa, I wish to ask the Senator from South Carolina if it is not a fact that there are less voting places in Charleston County now than there were twenty years ago?

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir; that is not the fact.

Mr. TELLER. The testimony so shows before our committee.

Mr. BUTLER. That is not the fact.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, the facts are and still remain that the polling places have been decreased in South Carolina and in the city of Charleston. The Senator from South Carolina says they have been decreased in order to prevent repeating. Mr. President, in the city of New York they have two hundred and fifty or perhaps three hundred and fifty polling places. These repetitions go on there. In the State of Pennsylvania they have a constitutional provision I believe that election districts shall not have more than four hundred voters in them.

Mr. WALLACE. Two hundred and fifty.

Mr. ALLISON. Two hundred and fifty only vote at any one election precinct in Pennsylvania. Why is that? It is in order that there shall be a free ballot, not a repeating ballot as is the case in South Carolina. There must be a necessity for Federal intervention and supervision in South Carolina where repeating is possible in polling places where a thousand men or more are required to vote at a single poll.

Mr. WALLACE. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that restricting an election division to two hundred and fifty voters does not prevent repeating in the city of Philadelphia. It is a very common vice there.

Mr. ALLISON. So I have been told, and yet I find in the constitution of the State of Pennsylvania other safeguards for elections; and one is this: The Senator from Indiana the other day exhausted his vocabulary of invective against the Federal judges of the United States because they were authorized to appoint commissioners or overseers or supervisors of election; and he used the word "overseer" as a term of reproach, alluding to the old slavery days, and said he hoped that word would be rung in the ears of the American people until it became a by-word and a reproach. And yet I find in the constitution of the State of Pennsylvania a provision which authorizes the judges of the common-pleas courts in every county in that State to appoint two overseers of election upon the request of five citizens, and that these shall be members of different parties; and they have power to control votes at the elections, have they not?

Mr. WALLACE. That is true; and there is no kind of necessity for Federal overseers or supervisors, and as the marshal himself swore there is no kind of necessity for deputy marshals. Besides, sir, we of Pennsylvania do not want Federal power to enforce State restrictions against voters of the State. We can take care of the polls ourselves. We do not want Federal troops to enforce the State restrictions. That is for us, and not for Federal power.

Mr. BLAINE. One moment. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania be good enough to state who it was that asked that Federal supervisors might be appointed in Philadelphia?

Mr. WALLACE. Federal supervisors were sought for by the democratic party in part and by the republican party in part——

Mr. BLAINE. By the democrats, then, mostly. The democrats asked for them.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the Senator wait till I answer? Please to await the completion of my answer. I assert that they became the only means by which the democrats could protect themselves against the gross wrongs that were perpetrated upon them by the repeaters and marshals in the city of Philadelphia.

Mr. BLAINE. Very well, the Senator admits that the Federal election law with its supervisors was applied at the request of the democrats of Philadelphia and protected them against repeaters. If that is not giving away the whole case, I do not know what is.

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator misstates my answer entirely. I said this protected them against marshals of disreputable character, protected them against republican repeaters, protected them against wrongs on the ballot and the constitutional right of franchise.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania objects to the presence of Federal supervisors. He wants the State authorities to have the whole control, and that is what I say is the issue involved here. It is one between those who believe that the Government of the United States shall be a stranger and an alien in the States on election day, and those who believe that the Federal Government should have its presence on election day when members of Congress are to be chosen. And I will say to my friend from Pennsylvania that he does not seem to agree with the democratic committee of the House of Representatives who made investigation into the election in Philadelphia in 1876. I have here a report signed by a select committee on alleged fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, and Jersey City, all democrats, in which they complain that the Federal supervisors in Philadelphia were not active enough and vigilant enough in the discharge of their duties. They say:

> Your committee would call particular attention to the fact that the chief supervisor of elections for the city of Philadelphia (a Federal officer) failed to do his duty, in this, that he did not instruct the supervisors under him to canvass and purge the registration lists in order to find who were bona fide citizens and voters, as was done in the cities of New York, Brooklyn, and Jersey City.

That is the report of a democratic committee of the House of Representatives commending this law, as they do commend it, and saying that to this law we were indebted in 1876 for a fair and honest election in the city of New York, and that the Federal supervisors in that city had discharged completely and thoroughly the duties imposed upon them by law, and did not engage, as the Senator from Indiana said they did, in the exercise of acts of arbitrary power. Here is an indorsement by a democratic committee, signed S. S. Cox, chairman, A. V. Rice, and A. M. Waddell, all democrats; a report made on the 3d of March, 1877, indorsing this whole supervisor system, and complaining that in Philadelphia the supervisors did not do their duty.

But, Mr. President, I have been led somewhat astray from the line of my arguments by these interruptions. I come back again, however, and repeat that if you repeal this provision of law or if you allow it to be modified as is proposed in the sixth section of this bill, you take away from all the civil officers of the Government of the United States all power and authority over elections on the days when members of Congress are to be elected in the several States of the Union. I do not say that that is the purpose of this bill, but I do say that is the argument made by Senators on this floor who support it, and that will be its effect. They insist that all Federal authority shall be withdrawn, that there shall be no exercise of power by the marshals with respect to the elections at which members of Congress are to be elected, and there can be no assertion of power except through the tedious processes of the courts, which cannot be served until the wrong is accomplished.

If what I have said be true with reference to this sixth section, then it is true that this bill is intimately connected with and associated with a repeal measure that is to follow and is also to be presented to the President upon an appropriation bill, the appropriations to be passed upon the condition that he will agree to the repeal of the sections of the Revised Statutes which constitute our election laws, or so much of them as are effectual to preserve the purity of the ballot-box. That is the issue. You may cover it up by historic recitals of what was done in 1863–'64, as did my friend from Maryland [Mr. GROOME] the other day; you may snow it under by allusions to what has been done hitherto at the State capitals in reference to Legislatures; but you must come back in the end to the real difference existing between the democrats and the republicans, which is, that you insist that there shall be no supervision by the General Government of elections at any time and any place, while we insist that that supervision shall go on, and that is involved as much in this bill as it is involved in the legislative, executive, and judicial bill which is to follow; and if one bill is signed the other might as well be; and if one bill is vetoed upon the principles adhered to by the republican party the other must necessarily be vetoed. I do not know and I have no right to express an opinion as to what an independent department of the Government will do or ought to do with regard to this question; I only mean to say here that the two measures are interwoven, and what is done with one will necessarily be done with the other.

Mr. President, I do not think that I ought to occupy the time of the Senate in a discussion of the question as to whether we have the authority to provide for the use of the Army of the United States to enforce the laws of the United States in cases of great emergency. Have we reached a point in this discussion that it is necessary to argue that question? The Army of the United States has been so used from the foundation of the Government till now. General Washington used the Army to enforce the laws in the State of Pennsylvania in 1794, and did what would shock the sensibilities, I suppose, of our democratic friends in this Chamber. He permitted the governor of the State of Virginia to be commander-in-chief of the militia of the States of New Jersey and Pennsylvania. The Congress that followed gave him express authority to keep a force of one thousand five hundred men in the western counties of Pennsylvania. In 1807, under the administration of Jefferson, the regular Army of the United States was authorized to be used as the militia of the United States could before be used. And so from that day to this.

Now, sir, it is said that the President of the United States ought to sign these bills with this legislation upon them, that it will be revolutionary on his part (as we say this action is on the part of the two Houses of Congress) if he should fail to do this. Why, sir, the President of the United States is an independent branch of this Government, and must exercise his own judgment and will in this regard, and in its exercise he exerts one-sixth of the legislative power of the nation.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Does not the Constitution say that "all" legislative power therein granted is vested in the two Houses of Congress?

Mr. ALLISON. The very first words of the Constitution I believe the Senator has very nearly quoted. It does say that all legislative power shall rest in Congress; but it says that all executive power shall vest in the President of the United States, and it says that all judicial power shall vest in a Supreme Court of the United States and in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. Yet, do we not all know that we exert here this day and hour executive power? Do we not pass upon every nomination that is made, and therefore the executive power is not wholly vested in the President? Do we not exercise judicial power in cases of impeachment and in many other cases in this Chamber? And yet the same Constitution says that all judicial power shall be vested in the Supreme Court and such inferior courts as Congress by law shall establish. These are general terms; they are modified, of course, by specific provisions, and when the veto power was placed in the hands of the President it was placed there as an additional negative, which he could exercise to impede legislation, and when exercised it requires a two-thirds vote of both Houses to overcome it.

Is it said that the veto power cannot be exercised by the President in his discretion? It is too late for democrats to make that claim, I submit. It is too late for anybody to make that claim in the United States. I believe in the constitution of every State in this Union there is to-day a veto power authorized in the governor. How is it in the State of Florida? Does not the governor in that State exercise the veto power, and does it not require two-thirds of both branches of the Legislature to overcome it? In twenty-three States of this Union, and in those States which have most recently framed constitutions, they have adopted this provision that the executive shall exert upon all bills sent to him legislative power to the extent of rejecting them and requiring two-thirds to overcome the veto.

That is now the settled policy of this country as reflected in nearly all, if not all, the State constitutions. Some States, it is true, only require a majority of all the members, others three-fifths, but in all the veto power is recognized as an essential element of safe legislation.

But, sir, it is the menace that is contained in this bill which our democratic friends have presented to the President, which is an interference with the executive power, and which, persevered in, will be revolutionary. Some have heretofore made complaint of the use of the word "revolution." What do we mean by "revolution?" We mean the accomplishment of a purpose outside of the Constitution; we mean an amendment of the Constitution without the ordinary processes. That is revolution. The Constitution of the United States says that bills shall be passed by both Houses and receive the signature of the President of the United States. If they do not have that signature they do not become laws unless by a two-thirds vote of each House. Yet Senators say that unless he shall be coerced or menaced into signing this bill, they will refuse the appropriations necessary to carry on the Government. General Jackson would have been astonished and amazed in his day at doctrines such as are presented here familiarly by democratic Senators on this floor. I have in my hand General Jackson's celebrated protest in 1834 to the Senate of the United States where the Senate had simply passed a resolution saying that the President of the United States had assumed powers not granted by the Constitution. He sent to the Senate of the United States a protest against the passage of that resolution, although it had no effect whatever, except as a simple declaration of opinion by the Senate of the United States. I quote from General Jackson's protest:

> The resolution of the Senate, as originally framed and as passed, if it refers to these acts—
> The removal of the deposits—
> presupposes a right in that body to interfere with this exercise of executive power. If the principle be once admitted, it is not difficult to perceive where it may end. If, by a mere denunciation like this resolution, the President should ever be induced to act—
> That is, coerced into action as is proposed here—> in a matter of official duty, contrary to the honest convictions of his own mind, in compliance with the wishes of the Senate, the constitutional independence of the executive department would be as effectually destroyed and its power as effectually transferred to the Senate as if that end had been accomplished by an amendment of the Constitution. But if the Senate have a right to interfere with the executive powers, they have also the right to make that interference effective;—

And that is what is proposed now to make that interference effective—> and if the assertion of the power implied in the resolution be silently acquiesced in we may reasonably apprehend that it will be followed at some future day by an attempt at actual enforcement. The Senate may refuse, except on the condition that he will surrender his opinions to theirs and obey their will, to perform their own constitutional functions; to pass the necessary laws; to sanction appropriations proposed by the House of Representatives, and to confirm proper nominations made by the President.

He said that if he did not protest in limine, in the very beginning, against this exercise of senatorial power, which was simply the expression of an opinion with reference to the constitutional duties of the Executive, in the end we should see the Senate of the United States making this effective by proposing conditions to appropriation bills; and that is what is proposed here to-day.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The same thing was said in the convention at Philadelphia in 1787, when the proposition was first brought forth to give to the House of Representatives the power to originate money bills, that it could be used for that purpose. That was the argument then.

Mr. ALLISON. But it never has been used for that purpose, it never can be constitutionally used for that purpose, because the moment the House of Representatives undertakes to say that it will not appropriate money to carry out the provisions of law, that moment it commences its career of revolution for the upturning and overthrowing of this Government. It is true the Army may go on, as it did go on two years ago, for six months without appropriations, but the Army cannot continue for any great period of time without appropriations nor can the executive and judicial officers of this Government execute their functions and discharge the duties imposed upon them by law for a long period of time without appropriations. Therefore, when the House of Representatives assume to say what was said in the debates in the convention in reference to what might be done assume to exercise a power and authority which is in itself revolution, because they take upon themselves the power to legislate according to their will, when the Constitution requires the concurrence of the Senate and the Executive or a two-thirds majority in both Houses.

Mr. President, I had noted some other points to which I desired to call attention; but I have been interrupted so much and have been diverted so often from questions that I was attempting to discuss that I think I shall not occupy the attention of the Senate longer. I want to say in conclusion that Senators mistake the temper of the republican party—I use that term because this is a political debate—they mistake the temper of the republican party and I believe the temper of the great body of the people of this Union when they suppose that we stand arrayed here in any opposition to a principle of free and honest elections in this country. They equally mistake the temper of the public mind when they suppose that they can by the repeal of statutes and the modification of statutes prevent the people of this country from having an honest and fair election in every part of it.

That will be done at congressional elections, and it will be done, in my judgment, if the States fail to do it honestly and fairly, by the interference of the Government of the United States. It may not be done this year or next year, when the democratic party has majorities in both Houses of Congress, but these questions will be discussed on the hustings and before the people, and there will be no such miserable and narrow contest as whether or not to repeal a penal statute which prohibits the use of soldiers at the polls except to prevent turbulence and riot and strife. No such question as that will be in debate before the American people, but the higher and greater question, which of the two political parties of this country is willing to see to it that all its citizens are permitted to go to an election-poll and cast one honest ballot at every election in this country. That is the contest, and that contest will be made North and South. There will be an honest ballot in the near future in all the Southern States as well as all the Northern States, and there will be no intimidation permitted there of armed forces under authority of the United States nor intimidation by armed forces in the shape of rifle clubs or other organizations of a like character.

There must be, and there will be sooner or later, such laws enacted by the Government of the United States as will secure free and fair elections in every congressional district in the United States. That is the real issue involved in this contest. If you see proper, having the majority now in the Senate and in the House, to say that unless your view upon this subject shall prevail you will stop the appropriations necessary to carry on the ordinary operations of the Government, so be it. I mistake the temper of the American people if they do not meet you on the ground you have chosen and stand against you, with or without appropriations.

Therefore, Mr. President, I shall vote now, here, and always against the modification of our statute law proposed in the sixth section of this bill, as reported by the Committee on Appropriations; and if it is finally agreed to as reported, I shall vote against the bill at every stage in which it appears, because I believe in doing so I am, instead of thwarting an honest ballot, protecting and securing free elections and honest elections in every State of this Union.

Mr. PADDOCK. I present an amendment in the form of a substitute for one previously submitted by me in lieu of the sixth section of the pending bill, which I shall propose at the proper time. I move that it lie on the table and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND. If no Senator wishes to address the Senate now, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. While the Sergeant-at-Arms is clearing the galleries the Chair will lay before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster-General, which will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the communication.

Mr. FERRY. As that is a matter relating to a building for the Washington City post-office, I move that it be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 22, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. GILBERT DE LA MATYR.

THE JOURNAL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that the Journal of yesterday is not yet made up, it having been a physical impossibility to complete it.

Mr. STEPHENS. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

SUBSIDIARY SILVER COIN.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at four minutes past twelve o'clock, and the House resumes the consideration of the bill pending at the close of the morning hour last Saturday, being the bill (H. R. No. 4) to provide for the interchange of subsidiary coins for legal-tender money under certain circumstances, and to make such coins a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $10. The pending question is on the motion entered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. LEWIS] to reconsider the votes by which the first and second sections were adopted.

Mr. DUNNELL. Let the sections be read as they now stand.

The SPEAKER. The two sections to which this motion relates will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the holder of any of the silver coins of the United States of smaller denominations than $1, may, on presentation of the same in sums of $10 or any multiple thereof, at the office of the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, receive therefor lawful money of the United States.

SEC. 2. The Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States who may receive any coins under the provisions of this act shall exchange the same in sums of $10 or any multiple thereof for lawful money of the United States on demand of any holder thereof.

Mr. STEPHENS. I propose to move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table. In the mean time I yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN.]

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I wish, Mr. Speaker, that we might cut out of this debate all that is extraneous and irrelevant to the original question, and find out the true intent and meaning of the bill as presented by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. I have given my best attention to the bill, and I will try to state what I understand to be its effect.

The law at present provides no redemptive agent for the subsidiary coin of the United States. The result is that small dealers in our large cities, and some large dealers, when they get into their possession more of this coin than they can use are compelled to sell it at a loss. Sometimes the discount is 1 per cent., sometimes 2 or 3. Now I ask every gentleman on this floor whether it is right that, for want of authority on the part of the Government to redeem this subsidiary coin, business men should be compelled to sell their surplus of this coin at a sacrifice? It must be apparent to everybody that this is not right.

Now, what is the intent and purport of this bill? It simply corrects that wrong. As presented by the committee the bill has four sections, but all its provisions are unimportant except this which requires the Government to redeem its subsidiary coin. It is true the bill alters the limit of legal-tender quality as respects this coinage; and I would prefer the ten-dollar limit to the twenty-dollar limit as now fixed in the bill. But even that is of trifling importance. If the Government is compelled to relieve those who have more of this coin than they want by giving in exchange for it legal-tender greenbacks, the other matter will take care of itself.

This bill is of great importance to small dealers in large cities. The law which should control this question is a law of common sense—a law, so to speak, like the law of gravitation; and if this measure be passed it will, in my judgment, elicit from the people nothing but approbation, because it will give relief to those who suffer from the present condition of affairs.

I trust that gentlemen of the House, discarding all irrelevant questions and looking at this matter in a non-partisan point of view, will consider the case in the light in which the committee present it. The measure is for the relief, not of bankers or brokers or capitalists, but of small traders in all our large cities. That is all there is of it, and all that can be made of it.

Mr. STEPHENS. I think that the first two sections of this bill are just as good as we are likely to get them. I should prefer $20 to $10 as the amount; but the bill is directly in the line of the petitions which have come to us on this subject. I therefore move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. LEWIS. I would like to state briefly the reasons which prompted me to make the motion to reconsider the vote by which the first two sections of this bill were adopted.

Mr. STEPHENS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I think that all the people need in reference to this matter is that the subsidiary coinage shall be increased in its legal-tender property to the amount of $20. This will obviate, so far as the masses of the people are concerned, all the difficulties and objections now connected with the subsidiary coinage. But if, in connection with the increase to $20 of the legal-tender quality of subsidiary coin, you pass the first two sections of this bill, then it will really be a measure in the interest of contraction. It will then become a bill against the best interests of the people—and why? We all know that the national banks of the United States desire that the small legal-tender bills, the "greenbacks" of small denominations shall be retired, as they come into competition with national-bank notes of small denominations. In this way they wish to have the entire business of this great Government as well as the business of the people done in their money instead of in the legal-tender money of the Government. There is no limit to the amount a banker can take to the Treasury of the United States or to any sub-treasury for deposit, and receive therefor the legal-tender money of the United States. For instance, if he takes $500 in amount he can demand a five-hundred-dollar bill, and it will be given to him, because we know from past experience that the Treasury Department assists the national banks to retire bills of small denomination of United States legal-tender money in exchange for large bills. Every dollar that is deposited and locked up in the Treasury becomes to that extent "dead capital," and we then have large bills instead of our present small legal-tender bills. We have also a certain amount of subsidiary coin locked up in the Treasury as gold is now locked up there. This is practical contraction. In this way the minor coins, which are necessary for the smaller transactions of the great masses of the people, are entirely subjected to the control of the capitalists and bankers. If you make it the interest of the latter to seek these minor coins with the same avidity as they do the gold, then that which is subsidiary in theory will no longer remain so in practice.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that this is the practical operation of this bill, and if it be passed with these first two sections you will find that it will result not only in favor of national banks in these two respects, but will also create a demand for national-bank notes of small denominations. The banks desire to issue such notes, for, unlike large bank-bills, they go far away from the banks, are worn out, lost, or destoyed, and many are never returned for redemption. If the banks can substitute their small bills for United States legal-tender notes they will thus subserve a purpose which they have long desired to carry out. Now, a half dollar does not perform simply the functions of a half dollar, but if you take two half dollars they perform the functions of one dollar, and four of them will perform the functions of two dollars. The subsidiary coin of the country is now performing the functions of small bank-bills, and if the banks can lock them up in the United States Treasury, the consequence will be to create a demand for national-bank notes of small denominations. That is a strong desire on the part of the banks, and they are not to be blamed for it. I appeal to any man acquainted with the practical operation of banks and banking in the United States if the effect will not be to create a demand for the small bills of the banks by locking up the subsidiary coin in the Treasury Department.

Mr. MILLS. Let me ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly.

Mr. MILLS. Is not the limitation which is placed upon the legal-tender quality of subsidiary silver in the same direction? Are not all sums of silver over $20 designated to be kept out of the market to make place for the paper of the banks?

Mr. LEWIS. I think it is wise to increase it to $20.

Mr. MILLS. But do you not think it wise to strike down all limitation?

Mr. LEWIS. I am not prepared to answer that question, which is a very grave one.

Mr. STEPHENS. I think, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama is entirely mistaken as to the operation of these sections. When these subsidiary coins get into the Treasury, not the banks, the United States will put them out again. I am myself utterly opposed to contraction, and if I thought this bill would have that tendency I would oppose it. I do not think it will. I do not wish, however, to consume the time of the House, and will therefore move to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 92, noes 29.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. On Saturday last various amendments were presented to be acted on in order in which they came. The Clerk will read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] to come in as a new section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. That the silver coin known as the trade-dollar heretofore coined by the mints of the United States shall be a legal tender to the full extent that the silver dollar of 412½ grains now being coined is.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I wish to be heard on my amendment.

Mr. REED. I rise to a point of order on that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. REED. It is that the proposed amendment is not germane to the bill. If the Chair will permit me, this is a bill providing specifically for the interchange of subsidiary coins for legal-tender money, and relates to a class of coins entirely different from the trade-dollar and involves a principle entirely different. I suppose the object of the rule of order that matters should be germane to the bill is that the House may not be surprised into a discussion of matters which should not properly come before them, I mean without proper notice. Now, this is a point of order which addresses itself not only to this amendment, but to several others of like character which have been suggested.

Mr. STEPHENS. I wish the gentleman from Tennessee would withdraw his amendment. We have got that subject before the Committee on Coinage. It is not exactly germane to this bill. There will be a report in a few days.

Mr. MCMILLIN. On the information of the gentleman from Georgia, that the question is before the committee and that a report will be made very soon, I withdraw the amendment.

The next amendment (proposed by Mr. GILLETTE) was read, as follows:

Insert as an additional section, between the third and fourth sections, the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, when desired by the holders of minor coins or of legal-tender money, redeem such coin or legal-tender money, when presented at the office of the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States in sums of $10, or any multiple thereof, in fractional paper currency of ten-cent, twenty-five-cent, and fifty-cent denominations, which shall be a legal tender for $10 and re-exchangeable for lawful money of the United States in sums of $10, or any multiple thereof.

Mr. REED. I raise the point of order on that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. REED. That it is not germane to this bill.

Mr. GILLETTE. I would like to say a word upon that point. If I understand the object of this bill it is to do away with the great inconvenience arising from the accumulation of this fractional silver coin. Now, before this silver coin was issued we never heard of any such inconvenience; and the object of this amendment is to reinstate the condition of things under which we then were. I urge it as a matter of economy and as a matter of convenience. Thousands of dollars of this fractional paper currency used to pass in our mails every day all over this country. It thus distributed itself wherever it was wanted. But this silver is barred out from the mails.

Mr. STEPHENS. I have no objection individually to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa; but that matter can come up hereafter. I do trust this bill, specific in its objects, will not be encumbered with any extraneous matter. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. The real point of order is that this is a bill to make fractional silver coin exchangeable for legal-tender money. The proposition in the amendment is to issue a new kind of paper money. That is not germane in a bill providing for the redemption of silver coin. It is not germane to the subject-matter of the bill, nor to any line in it.

Mr. FRYE. Do I understand the gentleman from Georgia to say that he is in favor of this amendment going upon this bill?

Mr. STEPHENS. Oh, no; I said I hoped the gentleman would withdraw the amendment.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to say that I am in favor of the gentleman's bill as he reported it to the House, and I hope it will not be encumbered with these amendments.

Mr. GILLETTE. The gentleman from Georgia informs me that he proposes to introduce from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures a bill to the same effect as what is proposed in my amendment. I therefore withdraw it.

The Clerk read the next amendment (proposed by Mr. NEWBERRY) as follows:

Add to the first section the following words:

And that all coins of every description of the United States of the face value of twenty-five cents and under shall be received at all post-offices for the payment of postage or the purchase of postage-stamps in any sum not exceeding $3.

Mr. STEPHENS. I see no objection to that amendment coming on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The House has passed from that part of the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that we have passed from the first section.

Mr. STEPHENS. I understood the amendment to be offered as an additional section.

The SPEAKER. The language employed is to "add to the first section."

Mr. STEPHENS. That is not in order.

Mr. NEWBERRY. When I offered this amendment the gentleman from Georgia remarked that it would be added as an additional section. I introduced it at first as an amendment to the first section; but it was subsequently stated that it was offered as an additional section to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman may have so stated on the floor; but that does not appear on the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let it be offered as an additional section. It need not come in as an addition to a section already adopted.

Mr. NEWBERRY. It was intended at the time that it should be offered as an additional section.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, of course, has no objection to the amendment being introduced. Does the gentleman from Georgia admit the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan as a new section?

Mr. STEPHENS. I have no objection to it myself. But I prefer it should be offered as a separate bill and that this bill should not be encumbered with it.

Mr. NEWBERRY. The RECORD shows that the gentleman from Georgia admitted it as an additional section at the time.

Mr. STEPHENS. I am perfectly willing it should be offered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has only to do with what is actually written out on the amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS. I told the gentleman he should have an opportunity of offering this as a fourth section, and I have no objection to his doing so. However, I think it better not to encumber this bill with it. I am with the gentleman in his object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] has appealed to the RECORD. The RECORD reads:

Mr. NEWBERRY. I move to add to the first section the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

And then there is a remark by the gentleman from Georgia:

Mr. STEPHENS. This is an additional section.

Now, the gentleman from Michigan himself introduced it as an addition to the first section.

Mr. NEWBERRY. It was so at first, but I agreed to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER. There was nothing said on that subject, as the Chair sees.

Mr. NEWBERRY. The suggestion was not opposed in any way. I offer this now as an additional section, and I do not think there will be any objection to that.

Mr. STEPHENS. I have no objection to the principle of the amendment, but I do not want this bill encumbered with it. I have already told the gentleman that the subject is before the committee, and a report will be made upon it. In my own opinion all these separate and distinct subjects should be embodied in separate and distinct bills. There will be a report on this subject, and I prefer that the gentleman should withdraw his amendment, as there are some here in favor of the bill who are opposed to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. There was clearly an agreement by which additional amendments might be offered. The Chair will entertain this as an additional section.

Mr. STEPHENS. That is correct; but I would ask the gentleman not to press it. If he does, however, the House can vote on it.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read, to come in as section 4.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

SEC. 4. That all coins of every description of the United States of the face value of twenty-five cents and under shall be received at the post-office for the payment of postage for the purchase of postage-stamps in any sum not exceeding $3.

Mr. NEWBERRY. Upon examining this bill I found that certain classes of coins were not provided for. There is a twenty-cent silver coin, a five-cent silver coin, a two-cent copper and bronze coin, and a three-cent nickel and copper coin; they are not provided for.

This difficulty has arisen in regard to such coins: in my own district parties have gone to the post-office and have returned stating to me that they had been refused postage-stamps for three-cent coins; had been refused even a single postage-stamp for a three-cent coin. Poor people, many in my own employ, have so stated to me. Again, they could not pay a debt of thirty cents with a twenty-cent piece and a ten-cent piece. There are many difficulties of that sort in regard to those coins. I consider it but proper that the people should have some way of disposing of these small coins. To use them for the purchase of postage-stamps is substantially to make these coins almost the same as legal tender; it would be a practical redemption of these coins if people can go to the post-office in their own township or village and purchase postage-stamps with these small coins. In that view of the case I hope the amendment will be adopted without objection.

Mr. MITCHELL. This amendment, it seems to me, would be a benefit on one side only; it certainly would increase the difficulties under which postmasters would labor. We all know very well that frequently large amounts of these small coins are collected, and, if people were so disposed, they might greatly embarrass the postmasters by presenting these small coins to them. If this amendment is insisted upon there ought be some way for the postmasters to get out of this difficulty.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I took pains to go to the Departments and obtain the circulars which have been issued providing means by which these small coins can be redeemed. One means is to allow parties to send these small coins in certain sums by registered letter without prepayment of postage. That is a practical redemption; but there is no power to compel the postmasters in the different townships to receive the small coins.

Mr. MITCHELL. I appreciate that difficulty, and with the explanation of the gentleman I have no objection to his amendment.

Mr. WARNER. These minor coins are already legal tender to the amount of twenty-five cents. If the amendment now proposed should be adopted they would be made legal tender to postmasters for $3. No provision is made by which the postmaster can pay them over to the Government in any other sum than as legal tender for twenty-five cents. I submit there would be an inconsistency in adopting this amendment without making some provision allowing postmasters to pay these coins over to the Government in settlement of their accounts.

Mr. REAGAN. In section 3586 of the Revised Statutes it is provided that—

The silver coins of the United States shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment.

Therefore it will be seen that these silver coins are now legal tender to postmasters for that amount.

Mr. ATKINS. That does not embrace the one and two cent pieces.

Mr. REAGAN. In a subsequent section it is provided that—

The minor coins of the United States shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding twenty-five cents in any one payment.

It seems to me it would result in great inconvenience to adopt the amendment now before the House. It is sufficient that we can use all these silver coins, five, ten, twenty-five cents and upward for the purchase of postal stamps to the amount of $5. It would be hard upon postmasters to require them to receive and handle large amounts of the one, two, and three cent pieces; that is the change made by the proposed amendment. I apprehend that the law making silver coins a legal tender for $5 in any one payment covers the case and is sufficient.

Mr. HASKELL. Sections 35 and 39 of the Revised Statutes already provide for the redemption of these coins, and when presented in sums of $20. They are a legal tender for sums of twenty-five cents. No postmaster in the United States has a right under the statute to refuse to take these coins for that amount. When a man has purchased twenty-five cents' worth of postage stamps with twenty-five cents of the minor coinage he can purchase twenty-five cents more with twenty-five cents of the minor coinage, and their redemption is provided for under the act of 1873 in the statute I have referred to.

The absurd feature of this bill is that you provide for the redemption of fractional silver in sums of $10 and make them a legal tender to the amount of $20, redeeming them at half the amount that they are a legal tender for among the people, and that in face of the fact that it takes two thousand pennies to procure redemption. The bill ought to be so arranged that the redemption of silver coins can be done in sums of $50 or $100 or less, if the legal tenders are left at $20 or less. It should be defeated, because as it now stands it is simply a bill for the retirement of the silver coins of this country, and there is no doubt about that.

Now, I favor as heartily as the gentleman from New York the redemption of the silver coins, but let us fix this bill so as to give some sort of rationality to it. You make these coins a legal tender for $20, and propose that the subtreasurers throughout the country shall redeem them at $10, at the same time you have no law for their redemption. What is the effect? It simply militates against the silver coins.

Mr. BRIGHT. I wish to call the attention of the Representative from Kansas to the fact that there is no redemption of the minor coinage except it be presented in sums of $20. It is a legal tender for twenty-five cents, but not redeemed unless presented in sums of $20.

Mr. HASKELL. That is exactly the point and there is where the absurdity of this measure comes in. You compel the shopkeepers to accumulate two thousand of these coins before he can get them redeemed, but any man who has $10 in silver can get it redeemed.

Now, no shopkeeper has a plethora of these coins when he has ten dollars' worth of them in his drawer, and by limiting their redemption to $50 you give the shopkeeper the burden and responsibility of securing the distribution of these small coins, or else if they have silver coins allow them to be redeemed at $10.

Mr. BRIGHT. I wish simply to call the attention of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] and the House to the fact that the clause to which reference has been made by the gentleman from Kansas provides for the redemption of the minor coins in sums of $20, but not in sums under that except to the extent of twenty-five cents. As I understand it, the principle of this bill is, to make the minor coinage a legal tender not only to the amount of $10, but, under the amendment, to the amount of $20.

Mr. WARNER. Only the silver coinage, not the minor coinage.

Mr. BRIGHT. The gentleman included the silver coinage in his remarks. I was answering the remarks of the gentleman from Kansas.

Now it will be seen that the object of the bill is only intended to remedy the existing defects of the statute as it now stands, and that is to make them a legal tender for all sums up to $20, and in that way utilize the minor silver coins and give the advantage to the holder; otherwise he would be cut off from it; otherwise when he presents them to the bank he is repulsed, except he does it to a very moderate extent; when he presents them to an individual in the payment of a debt he is repulsed. The coin of the United States is intended to serve the purpose of currency, and is so limited in circulation as to defeat its own object.

Mr. STEPHENS. As I said before, individually I am not opposed to this provision; it is, however, not exactly germane to the object of the bill. I want a vote upon the bill to-day. I therefore move the previous question upon the amendment offered, and leave it for the House to decide whether it shall come in or not.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. STEPHENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The first question was upon the amendment offered by Mr. NEWBERRY.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

SEC. 4. That all coins of every description of the United States of the face value of twenty-five cents and under shall be received at all the post-offices for the payment of postage or purchase of postage-stamps in any sum not exceeding $3.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was the amendment offered by Mr. FORT, which proposed to add an additional section, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be exchanged, at the Treasury and at all subtreasuries of the United States, legal-tender silver dollars of 420 grains standard silver for trade-dollars at par; and shall recoin the said trade-dollars into legal-tender dollars of 412½ grains of standard silver, as now provided by law; and shall stop the further coinage of trade-dollars.

Mr. REED. I make a point of order on that amendment, that it is not germane to the bill.

Mr. FORT. I have consented to withdraw that amendment, and I now withdraw it.

The next amendment was read, as follows:

After the word "dues" in the third line of the third section add the words "debts and demands;" so as to read: "in full payment of all dues, debts, and demands, public and private."

Mr. STEPHENS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. REED. Has not that section been passed?

The SPEAKER. It has. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] makes the point that the House has passed from the consideration of the third section; that a motion to reconsider the vote agreeing to that section has been laid on the table, and that no amendment to the section is now admissible. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The next section was read, and agreed to, as follows:

SEC. 4 [5.] That all laws or parts of laws in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The SPEAKER. The question now comes up on the substitute of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] which was read the other day.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is a point of order pending against that substitute.

Mr. STEPHENS. I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] will withdraw the substitute.

Mr. MILLS. I decline to withdraw it. Let the Chair rule on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] who made the point of order desire to speak upon it?

Mr. HAWLEY. I stated the other day the grounds for the point of order. The proposed substitute is not germane to the purposes of the pending bill. The bill is "to provide for the interchange of subsidiary coin for legal-tender money under certain circumstances, and to make such coins a legal-tender in all sums not exceeding $10," which is now changed to $20.

Mr. MILLS. If the Chair holds that the point of order can now be made I will not insist upon offering the substitute, for I know the point of order is well taken if it can be entertained.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is never led into a denial of any right which he thinks is possessed by any member of this House. Therefore the Chair entertains the point of order.

Mr. MILLS. I am satisfied the substitute is subject to the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The substitute is withdrawn.

Mr. EWING. I offer as a substitute for the whole bill the proposition which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is operating and has been partly executed.

Mr. EWING. It was distinctly understood that amendments might be offered.

The SPEAKER. That is true; but this was not offered when amendments were in order.

Mr. EWING. It is offered now.

The SPEAKER. But the previous question has been seconded and the main question ordered on the bill and amendments, which cuts off any further amendments whether as a substitute or as an amendment to the original text.

Mr. EWING. I must have been out of the House when the previous question was seconded. I was called away for a moment, and perhaps it occurred then. I relied upon the statement of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] made last Saturday——

The SPEAKER. The Chair would, of course, have recognized the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] if he had offered the amendment prior to the seconding of the previous question.

Mr. EWING. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will at any rate allow the substitute to be read.

Mr. STEPHENS. Let it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

SECTION 1. That the fractional silver coins and notes of the United States shall hereafter be exchangeable, at the pleasure of the holder, for lawful money of the United States when presented in sums of $20, or any multiple thereof, at the office of the Treasurer or of any assistant treasurer of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the lawful money of the United States shall hereafter be exchangeable, at the pleasure of the holder, for fractional silver coin or for fractional notes of the United States when presented in sums of $20, or any multiple thereof, at the office of the Treasurer or of any assistant treasurer of the United States.

SEC. 3. That fractional notes and fractional silver coin shall hereafter be a legal tender, in sums not exceeding $20, in payment of all debts, public and private.

SEC. 4. All acts or parts of acts limiting the amount of fractional currency are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. This proposition can come in by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEPHENS. It is not entirely germane, and as I want to put the bill on its passage to-day, I object to the substitute. I am in favor of the gentleman's purpose; but I do not wish to encumber this bill with provisions of that kind.

The SPEAKER. The proposed substitute is not before the House.

Mr. WARNER. I ask unanimous consent that the phrase "$10" in the first and second sections of the bill be changed to "$20" so that these sections shall not be incongruous with the third section as now amended.

Mr. STEPHENS. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the modification suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] in order to make the several sections of the bill congruous, will be agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not call for the reading of the engrossed bill; but I ask that the bill as it now stands may be read in full for the information of the House.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the holder of any of the silver coins of the United States of smaller denominations than $1 may, on presentation of the same in sums of $20 or any multiple thereof, at the office of the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, receive therefor lawful money of the United States.

SEC. 2. The Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States who may receive any coins under the provisions of this act shall exchange the same in sums of $20, or any multiple thereof, for lawful money of the United States on demand of any holder thereof.

SEC. 3. That the present fractional or subsidiary silver coins shall hereafter be a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $20, in full payment of all dues, public and private.

SEC. 4. That all coins of every description, of the United States, of the face value of twenty-five cents and under, shall be received at all post-offices for the payment of postage or the purchase of postage-stamps in any sums not exceeding $3.

SEC. 5. That all laws or parts of laws in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I hope that the gentleman in charge of this bill, as well as all other members, will consent that the word "minor," as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, be inserted in the fourth section, in place of "subsidiary," which I believe is the word there used.

Mr. WARNER. "Minor coins" would refer not to the twenty-five-cent pieces, but to nickel and copper pieces only.

Mr. STEPHENS. I prefer that the word "subsidiary" should remain.

Mr. GARFIELD. Twenty-five-cent pieces are not "minor coins."

Mr. STEPHENS. The word "subsidiary," where it occurs, is perfectly proper.

The SPEAKER. There is objection to the change suggested.

Mr. STEPHENS. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. STEPHENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL. I suggest an amendment to the title of the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS. Yes; I now intend to amend the title of the bill. I move the title be amended to read "twenty" instead of "ten," and the words "and for other purposes" be added.

The SPEAKER. The title will be read as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to provide for the interchange of subsidiary coins for legal-tender money under certain circumstances, and to make such coins a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $20, and for other purposes.

Mr. DUNNELL. The gentleman did not understand me. I propose to strike out the word "interchange" and to substitute for it the word "exchange."

Mr. STEPHENS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. GARFIELD. And the words "legal-tender money" should be stricken out and the words "lawful money of the United States" substituted therefor.

Mr. STEPHENS. I agree to that also.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to provide for the exchange of subsidiary coins for lawful money of the United States under certain circumstances, and to make such coins a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $20, and for other purposes.

The title, as amended, was agreed to.

CLERKS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee of Accounts, submitted the following report, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the committees of this House designated on the 15th instant as entitled to clerks under the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, making appropriations for the year ending June 30, 1880, be, and they are hereby, authorized to employ clerks during the session within the present fiscal year, and any excess of clerks hereby authorized over the number provided for by existing laws shall, under direction of the Committee of Accounts, be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. WISE. I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I have demanded the previous question which cuts off all amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1343) to provide for certain expenses of the present session of Congress, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill to provide for certain expenses of the present session of Congress, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following sums of money be, and the same are hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, namely: To meet the miscellaneous expenses of the House of Representatives, to be disbursed by the Clerk of the House, $20,000.

To pay Watson Boyle, H. A. Alcot, and W. H. Smith, employed under resolutions of the House, at $3.60 per day each from and including March 1 to June 30, 1879, $1,317.60.

To pay William Douglas, in charge of water-closet, from and including March 1 to June 30, 1879, $282.30.

To pay person employed in preparing general index to Journals of Congress under resolution of the House of June 18, 1878, at the rate of $2,500 per annum, from and including March 1 to June 30, 1879, $840.30.

To pay eight messengers in the post-office of the House, from and including April 4, 1879, until the conclusion of the present session of Congress, at the rate of $800 each for seven months.

Mr. GARFIELD. Why not put those items upon the legislative appropriation bill, to which they are appropriate?

Mr. ATKINS. I hardly think they are.

Mr. GARFIELD. These items belong there. There is a good deal of miscellaneous appropriation in the bill which is now in the Committee of the Whole. We do not want to make a point of order on this proposition.

Mr. ATKINS. This bill makes appropriations for several persons for the remaining portion of the present fiscal year.

The SPEAKER. It is in the nature of a deficiency.

Mr. GARFIELD. I thought it was for the next year. If it is in the nature of a deficiency, of course I withdraw all objection.

Mr. COFFROTH. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee to yield to me for the purpose of submitting an amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. What is the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. COFFROTH. There ought to be an appropriation made to pay postage on answers to letters received by the Committee on Invalid Pensions in reference to claims pending before that committee. There are over two thousand cases there, and there should be an appropriation of at least $500 for postage.

Mr. ATKINS. Has it been usual to make appropriation for postage for committees of this House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has never known such a thing.

Mr. ATKINS. I think I can hardly yield to that amendment.

Mr. COFFROTH. This is an extraordinary case.

The SPEAKER. It is a question of propriety.

Mr. ATKINS. Of course, and it is a question not to be determined by me.

Mr. COFFROTH. The Committee on Invalid Pensions will have two or three thousand cases. That number of letters will come to that committee. They should be answered, and the answers will require the payment of postage. The constituents of all members of the House are interested.

Mr. ATKINS. There are a good many committees which have voluminous correspondence, and I am sure the Committee on Appropriations is one of them, and there is no provision in the bill for the payment of postage of those committees. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed the bill (S. No. 218) changing the name of the National Bank of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio, to the National Lafayette and Bank of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

WASHINGTON CITY POST-OFFICE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General relative to a building for the Washington City post-office.

The SPEAKER. The communication, if there be no objection, will be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. STEPHENS. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The SPEAKER. This communication relates only to a building. It is in reference to the building at present occupied by the city post-office, and which the Postmaster-General states is inadequate in size to the proper discharge of the duties of the office. The same subject was last session before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. STEPHENS. Very well; I thought it related to the Post-Office Department.

The SPEAKER. It does not relate to any postal laws or anything of that sort. It relates simply to a public building.

The communication was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. ATKINS. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

SUBPŒNA TO OFFICER OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. KNOTT. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to submit the report which I send to the desk. It is the unanimous report of the committee, and has relation to a matter on which the committee was authorized to report at any time.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the following communication from the Adjutant-General of the Army of the United States—

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 16, 1879.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a subpœna addressed to Mr. Ferris Finch, file clerk of the House of Representatives, whose attendance is required on the 18th instant as a witness before the general court-martial in the case of Colonel D. S. Stanley, Twenty-second Infantry, with request that it may be delivered to Mr. Finch.

I have the honor to be, sir, most respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

To the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

Accompanied by the following paper:

Subpœna for a witness to appear before a general court-martial.

To Ferris Finch, esq., file clerk, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C., greeting:

You are hereby commanded to appear as witness on the 18th day of April, 1879, at eleven o'clock a. m., at Army building, New York City, before the general court-martial appointed thereat by Special Order No. 66, issued from headquarters of the Army, Adjutant-General's office, of date March 20, 1879, to testify to certain matters before said court in the case of the United States against Colonel D. S. Stanley, Twenty-second Infantry, for the United States; and you are further commanded to bring with you and produce before the court manuscript of the testimony given by Colonel W. B. Hazen, Sixth Infantry, before the Military Committee, House of Representatives, in 1872, also answers to interrogatories propounded to him at the same time by said committee, (by the chairman thereof,) both written and printed, and to then and there remain and abide the orders of the said court in the premises pursuant to the statute in such cases made and provided. Of your appearance before said court at the time and place stated in the summons fail not under penalties of the law.

Given under my hand this 16th day of April, A. D. 1879.
D. G. SWAIM,
Judge-Advocate, United States Army, Judge-Advocate of the said Court.

having had the same under consideration, would respectfully submit the following report:

Section 1202 of the Revised Statutes provides that "every judge-advocate of a court-martial shall have power to issue the like process to compel witnesses to appear and testify which courts of criminal jurisdiction within the State, Territory, or district where such military courts shall be ordered to sit, may lawfully issue," and the question which lies at the threshold of the investigation your committee has been required to make in this instance is whether, under that provision, a citizen can in any case be lawfully compelled to go out of the State, Territory, or district in which he resides to testify as a witness before a court-martial. In other words, whether the process which the judge-advocate is authorized by this section to issue may run to any part of the United States, as is the case with similar process from the circuit and district courts of the United States in criminal proceedings, or whether it is limited to the State, Territory, or district in which such military court shall be ordered to sit.

If the first of these hypotheses is correct, the judge-advocate of a court-martial is certainly invested with the most extraordinary powers. He may compel a resident of Maine, under an unlimited penalty of fine and imprisonment, to abandon his home, his business, and his family to attend the trial of some trivial matter supposed to be "unbecoming an officer and a gentleman" pending before a military court sitting upon the borders of New Mexico, while upon similar process for a similar purpose the citizen may be taken from his home in the south of Florida to the northern boundary of Alaska.

Nor can it be claimed that it is indispensable or even necessary to the proper conduct of the public service or the security of private right that such a tremendous power should be conferred by law upon any military officer of the Government. A court-martial may be ordered to sit at any time or at any place, and depositions of witnesses residing beyond the limits of the State, Territory, or district in which any military court may be ordered to sit, if taken on reasonable notice to the opposite party and duly authenticated, may be read in evidence before such court in any case not capital.

It is reasonable to presume, therefore, that if Congress intended to confer upon the judge-advocate of a court-martial a power so tremendous and at the same time so unnecessary, it would have done so in clear and unequivocal language—language about which there could be no possible mistake. There are several forms of expression in which such an intention could have been shown to the exclusion of all possible doubt. It might have been done by simply adding to the section the words "and such process may run into any State, Territory, or district of the United States," and that, too, without obscuring the meaning or marring the euphony of the sentence. Or if it had been the intention of Congress to confer upon the judge-advocate of a court-martial the same power to compel the attendance of witnesses before such court as that exercised for similar purposes by the circuit and district courts of the United States in criminal cases, that intention could have been as clearly expressed.

That has not been done, however. The language of the statute is that the "judge-advocate of a court-martial shall have power to issue the like process to compel witnesses to appear and testify which courts of criminal jurisdiction within the State, Territory, or district where such military courts shall be ordered to sit may lawfully issue." What courts are here referred to? Certainly not the courts of the United States; first, because, as already remarked, if such had been the intention the natural and obvious language would have been "the courts of the United States having criminal jurisdiction." And, second, because if "the courts of the United States of criminal jurisdiction" are meant, the expression "within the State, Territory, or district where such military court shall be ordered to sit" is totally unnecessary and meaningless, for the power of the United States courts to issue process to compel witnesses to appear before them and testify in criminal cases is the same in every State, Territory, or district, no matter where such military court might be ordered to sit. It would seem, therefore, that the courts referred to in this section should be taken to be the courts of the State, the Territory, or the district having criminal jurisdiction, and as their process to compel witnesses to appear and testify cannot run into another State, Territory, or district, neither can that of a court-martial sitting within their limits.

This construction of the section under consideration is not only authorized by the familiar rule of legal interpretation which requires a statute conferring summary power upon a court or officer to be construed strictly, but justified by other instances in which the mode of procedure in tribunals established by the laws of the United States is regulated by the laws of the State in which such courts are held.

For example, section 914 of the Revised Statutes provides that the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding in civil causes, other than equity and admiralty causes, in the circuit and district courts shall conform as near as may be to the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding existing at the time in like causes in the courts of record of the State within which such circuit or district courts are held, any rule of the court to the contrary notwithstanding.

Again, it is provided in section 915 that "in common-law causes in the circuit and district courts the plaintiff shall be entitled to similar remedies by attachment or other process against the property of the defendant which are now provided by the laws of the State in which such court is held for the courts thereof; and such circuit and district courts may from time to time, by general rules, adopt such State laws as may be in force in the States where they are held in relation to attachments and other process: Provided, That similar preliminary affidavits or proofs and similar security as required by such State laws shall be first furnished by the party seeking such attachment or other remedy."

So, also, it is provided in the next section that the party recovering a judgment in any common-law cause in any circuit or district court shall be entitled to similar remedies upon the same, by execution or otherwise, to reach the property of the judgment debtor as are provided in like causes by the laws of the State in which such court is held.

Another, however, and perhaps a stronger reason for the conclusion that it was never intended that the process which the judge-advocate of a court-martial is authorized by this section to issue should run beyond the State, Territory, or district in which such court should be ordered to sit, is that during the same session of Congress, and by an act approved on the same day, the following provision was adopted as the ninety-first article in the rules and articles for the government and regulation of the Army:

"The depositions of witnesses residing beyond the limits of the State, Territory, or district in which any military court may be ordered to sit, if taken upon reasonable notice to the opposite party and duly authenticated, may be read in evidence before such court in cases not capital."

If, therefore, the construction of these two sections together justifies the conclusion that the process which the judge-advocate is authorized to issue to compel the attendance of witnesses cannot run beyond the limits of the State, Territory, or district in which the court-martial is ordered to sit, it follows that as the court before which Mr. Finch is desired to appear is sitting in the State of New York he would be under no legal obligation to obey its subpœna if served upon him in the District of Columbia or elsewhere beyond the limits of that State.

There is a further question, however, and perhaps so far as this House is concerned a more important one, yet to be considered, and that is whether Mr. Finch or any other officer of the House has the right or can be lawfully compelled without the consent of the House to produce in obedience to a subpœna duces tecum any paper belonging to its files.

The rule as laid down in Archbold's Queen's Bench Practice (volume 1, page 353) on the authority of Lord Ellenborough in Amy vs. Long (9 East, 473) is that the writ of subpœna duces tecum is of compulsory obligation on a witness to produce papers thereby demanded which he has in his possession and which he has no lawful or reasonable excuse for withholding, of which excuse the court and not the witness must judge; and the same doctrine was substantially held by Chief-Justice Marshall in the trial of Aaron Burr, (Burr's Trial, volume 1, page 188.) The qualifications to this rule, however, (that is, what constitutes a lawful or reasonable excuse for refusing to produce papers demanded by a subpœna duces tecum,) are as much a part of the law as the rule itself; and one of the most obvious and important of these qualifications would seem to be that if the person to whom legal custody of the paper belongs could not be lawfully required to produce it, neither can the person in whose actual possession it may be found. Some of the American cases go to the extent indeed of asserting that a witness cannot be compelled to produce a paper upon a subpœna duces tecum unless he has the legal control as well as the actual custody of it. For instance, in the case of the president and directors of the Bank of Utica vs. Hillard (5 Cowen, 153) a subpœna duces tecum was issued at the instance of Hillard, the defendant in the action, commanding one Collings, the clerk of the bank, (which was the plaintiff,) to produce certain books and papers belonging to the bank, and upon his refusal to produce them the court said:

"The obligation of Collings to produce the books upon the duces tecum depends on the question whether they were in his possession and under his control. He was the mere clerk of the plaintiffs, and in that character had no such property in or possession of the books as imposed the obligation to bring them. They were under the control of the cashier, who might forbid their removal or place them beyond the reach of the witness."

On a subsequent trial of the same case the defendant sued out a subpœna duces tecum commanding the cashier to produce them, and upon his refusing to do so a motion for an attachment against him was overruled on the ground "that the course for proving the books or papers of a bank where it is the adverse party is to give notice to produce them, and on its non-compliance to show the contents by other evidence as in other cases," which was equivalent to saying that as the bank could not be legally compelled to produce them neither could their cashier who had them in his custody and under his control. It may be added here that Chief-Justice Marshall in the trial of Burr was of opinion that the subpœna duces tecum should be directed to the head of the department in whose custody the desired papers were, and not to a mere subordinate in whose actual possession they might be found.

If these principles are correct it is obvious that the file clerk could not be lawfully compelled by a subpœna duces tecum to remove any paper or document whatever from the files of the House. He is not even mentioned or recognized in the rules as an officer or employé of the House. He is merely an assistant employed by the Clerk to enable him to discharge one of the functions which from the necessity of the case or the unbroken practice and usage of the House pertains to his office, namely, that of preserving and arranging the papers belonging to the archives of the House so that they may be immediately produced whenever the business of the House or the convenience of any of its members may require. He has no property in nor authority to remove a solitary paper from the files for any other purpose than those just specified. Were he to attempt to do so the Clerk could forbid it, remove the papers beyond his reach, or remove him from his position, as he might choose. It is scarcely necessary to add that if he cannot be compelled by legal process to take a paper from the files he has no authority to do so voluntarily, unless by the permission or under the direction of the House.

Nor has the Clerk of the House himself any such authority, either of his own volition or in obedience to a subpœna duces tecum. It is simply his duty, as one of the incidents of his office, to keep the files of the House, preserve the papers belonging to its archives, and see that they are arranged in convenient and proper order. He has no such property in possession of or control over them as to impose any obligation upon him to produce them before a court or to authorize him to do so of his own accord. They belong to the House, and are under its absolute and unqualified control. It can at any time take them from the custody of the Clerk, refuse to allow them to be inspected by any one, order them to be destroyed, or dismiss the Clerk for permitting any of them to be removed from the files without its expressed consent.

The reasons why the House should not only have, but be especially careful to maintain such absolute and unconditional control of the papers belonging to its archives, are as patent as they are manifold. As already intimated, they are preserved for the use of the House, and are liable at any time to be required by its members to facilitate the discharge of their various duties; and if they were allowed to be taken from the files at the pleasure of any of its officers, without its previous permission or direction, to be produced in court or carried elsewhere and kept an indefinite length of time, it is not difficult to see that inconvenience, delay, and uncertainty in the transaction of the business of the House might frequently be the result, to say nothing of the increased liability of the papers themselves to ultimate destruction or loss. And besides, instances might frequently occur in which the House could not consent to the use of papers belonging to its files in a public trial without a violation of good faith or a breach of public policy; especially in cases where witnesses have given testimony before the House or some of its committees tending to disgrace or render themselves liable to a criminal prosecution other than for perjury committed in giving such testimony. In this regard it has long been the settled and invariable practice of the English Parliament to refuse to permit the testimony taken before any of its committees to be used in any criminal proceeding involving the party who testified, provided he testified truly.

But again, it is a principle well understood that the President, the governor of a State, or the head of a department is not bound to produce papers or disclose information communicated to him when in his own judgment the disclosure would, on consideration of public policy, be improper or inexpedient, (1 Greenl., E., § 251,) and by parity of reason the House of Representatives, having the exclusive custody and absolute control of the papers belonging to its own archives, should judge for itself whether the production or inspection of these papers would be injurious to the public interests or not, and refuse or permit such production or inspection accordingly as its own judgment might dictate.

Of course your committee will not be understood as intimating that the House should refuse or even hesitate to do anything consistent with its duty to itself and the public interest to facilitate the ascertainment of truth or promote the proper administration of justice in any case pending in any court, civil or military, or that cases may not arise in which, upon a proper request, it would be the duty of the House to order that original papers belonging on its files be produced in a court, however remote from the seat of Government, to be used as evidence in a cause there pending.

Such cases, however, will probably be of rare occurrence, and in others in which the House may deem it proper to refuse to permit original papers to be taken from its files, but shall consent that copies may be had, such copies upon being properly proven may be made available as evidence; and as it does not appear that the papers asked for in the present instance are to be used as evidence in any criminal proceeding against the party who gave the testimony embraced in them, your committee sees no reason why that course should not be pursued in this case. The adoption of the following resolutions is therefore recommended:

Resolved 1. That no officer or employé of the House of Representatives has the right either voluntarily or in obedience to a subpœna duces tecum to produce any document, paper, or book belonging to the files of the House before any court or officer, nor to permit any copy of any testimony given or paper filed in any investigation before the House or any of its committees, or of any other paper belonging to the files of the House, except such as may be authorized by statute to be copied, and such as the House itself may have made public, to be taken without the consent of the House first obtained.

2. That the consent of the House is hereby given to either party in the case of the United States against Colonel D. S. Stanley, now pending before the general court-martial sitting in the city of New York, to have made and properly proven such copies of the papers mentioned in the subpœna duces tecum issued by the judge-advocate of said court, and directed to Ferris Finch, esq., file clerk of the House of Representatives, on the 16th instant, as may be desired, but that the originals thereof shall not be removed from the files of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. The resolutions reported by the committee I think are in the main just, and I concur with them. But I certainly do not concur in the reasoning in part that has led to these conclusions. It seems to me a very violent construction of the law to say generally about our files and our officers here that a court-martial has no power to issue its summons and enforce it outside the State where the court happens to be held. If this House gives its assent to that doctrine it will authorize the refusal of citizens everywhere, so far as the authority of this House goes, to obey the summons of courts-martial if they happen to live across the line of the State, a thing which has never been done, so far as I know, either in the practice or in the constructions which have been given to the law.

Of course I concur heartily and thoroughly with what the committee say about any court, either military or civil, not having the right to take original papers from our files. But I would think it was going too far for us to say that we would not permit the taking of papers from our files under any circumstances—and I believe the resolutions do not quite say that—for it might be an allegation of forgery that was pending, and the only proof as to whether there had been a forgery or not would be the original document.

Mr. KNOTT. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him I will say that the resolutions do not go to the extent he seems to suppose. They simply assert that no officer of this House has a right to remove any paper belonging to its archives from its files without the consent of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. So I understand, and I concur in that.

Mr. KNOTT. And it is further said that the committee do not seek to intimate that cases may not arise in which it would be the duty of the House to order the production of papers on a request for that purpose before a court however remote.

Mr. GARFIELD. I understood that, but I was objecting only to that branch of the reasoning which seemed to limit the power of a court-martial to enforce its summons by the boundaries of the State in which it was convened. And I think the resolutions all right, except as to one thing. I think we ought as a matter of comity to direct our Clerk to forward a certified copy. We are not obliged to do so, but as a matter of comity I think we should.

Mr. KNOTT. Will the gentleman permit me to suggest that a certified copy would not answer the purpose? It would have to be an examined copy, proved by the deposition of the witness making the examination.

Mr. GARFIELD. Why should we not in this case, as a matter of comity, authorize our file clerk to answer the summons, but at the same time direct him to retain the custody of our original papers?

Mr. KNOTT. It would be about as convenient for the parties desiring these papers to come here and obtain examined copies in the way I have suggested as it would be for an officer of this House to leave his post of business and go to New York and remain there an indefinite length of time, keeping the papers in his custody. In fact, it would be far more inconvenient to the public service to authorize our officer to take our records from their place on the files to a remote city than it would be to authorize the persons desiring them to come here and procure copies.

Mr. GARFIELD. If they want the originals as the substantive element in the testimony, then any copy they might make here would not answer, and in that case we would be obliged to act again and to authorize our clerk to carry the originals to where the court is sitting and bring them back to us.

I do not know whether the court wants the original papers in this case or certified copies, and we are delaying their action unnecessarily by this resolution. I have now said all I desire to say.

Mr. KNOTT. With regard to the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] upon the jurisdiction of the judge-advocate to send process outside of the State in which the court-martial may be sitting, I will simply remark that what has been submitted by the committee is merely by way of argument in support of their conclusion; in fact, is not definitely stated. The question is not definitely determined whether the judge-advocate of a court-martial has power to send process beyond the limits of a State in which his court is sitting. It is merely a suggestion that he has not that power, and for one I may be permitted to say that I have no doubt on the question whatever, and that I believe that he has no power to send his process outside of the State, district, or Territory in which the court may be sitting.

I will not argue the point or trespass further on the time of the House. The propriety of the House in preserving its own archives is so obvious that further argument is unnecessary. I therefore move the previous question upon the adoption of the resolutions reported by the committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. I trust the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] will allow this matter to go over until to-morrow.

Mr. KNOTT. No, sir; we may as well settle it now; time is running.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman will not press the question now. I think the request of the court is a reasonable one, and I see no necessity for haste in the matter.

Mr. KNOTT. I have demanded the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was listening a moment; it is not unusual to hear suggestions from members even when a demand for the previous question is pending.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was put on agreeing to the resolutions reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, and on a division there were ayes 73, noes not counted.

So the resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. KNOTT. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The question was put; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I appeal to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] not to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, but to postpone it until to-morrow, for gentlemen after looking into this matter may change their minds. It will be much better for him to allow the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table to lie over.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again submit the question.

The question was again put on the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; and it was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to proceed with the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BAILEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose at this stage of the debate to consume the time of the committee or prolong the hours of this extra session of Congress by any extended remarks upon the amendments now under consideration.

Gentlemen on this side of the House have with marked and signal ability presented to this committee and to the country the constitutional questions involved in this legislation, and the beneficent results accomplished by its provisions, with far greater clearness and perspicuity, than I could ever hope to do; yet I am not content, for myself or those I represent, to remain an idle spectator and not lift my voice in protestation of what I conceive to be an infamous and shameful usurpation of power at this time and in this manner on the part of the democratic majority of this House.

We are legally and presumably here as legislators in our respective representative capacities in the popular law-making department of the Government, in the supposed proper exercise of our official duties, that include within their broad and widening circle not only the interests of our individual constituents but the welfare and prosperity of over forty millions of the most enlightened people of the English-speaking race. Mr. Chairman, who demands this legislation? Do the mechanics, the artisans, the working classes, who really comprise the majority of our population and who are so well schooled in practical common sense and judgment—do they demand it? Go ask the unemployed thousands all over the land who are begging for work and fighting want and starvation from their homes and their firesides. Does commerce demand it? Let the drooping sails of our merchantmen, the markets glutted with the products of our industries, and the almost deserted wharves in some of our southern cities answer the question.

Do the business interests of the country require it? Go into our workshops, our factories, our counting-houses, on change, and let the prostrate energies of the country, the unparalleled number of business failures, and the general depression in trade write the reply in the history of the hour.

Who, then, demand it? The answer goes up from every hill-top and valley, all over the land: not the people, not the country, but the democratic leaders and politicians. I deny that in my section of the State any considerable number of the rank and file of the democratic voters have ever asked or petitioned for this legislation or, to my knowledge, have ever taken exceptions to the practical operations of those statutes now under discussion appointing deputy marshals and supervisors of election to maintain a free ballot and insure an honest count.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that in my district, comprising within its limits two cities, the fair-minded thinking men of all political shades of opinion and party, until the edict was issued at the democratic star-chamber caucus in this Capitol, very generally commended the provisions of this supervisors and marshals law, and were quite satisfied with the manner of its execution and its conceded beneficial results in the interests of a pure and free election.

In the State of New York there was a very general and popular demand for the enactment of these laws. Elections had almost become a farce and the popular will was subverted by illegal votes and fraudulent counts. I desire in this connection to incorporate in my remarks a portion of that famous open letter of that pure and good man the late Horace Greeley, in October, 1869, to Samuel J. Tilden, the then chairman of the democratic State committee:

> You and I grew up in the country, and are familiar with elections as there conducted. We both know that, except in a few districts where the voters are all on one side, it is morally impossible that any considerable proportion of fraudulent votes should there be polled. For those who attend a poll are nearly all well known to each other, and hardly ever is one entitled to vote who is not known to be so to men of each party. If one should offer a vote who is not so known, he is challenged and questioned of course, and his answers will convict him if a bogus voter. I do not believe that the illegal vote in the rural districts was ever 1 per cent. of the whole number polled, even when there was no registration of legal voters.
> How different is the case in cities, and especially in this Babel, you very well know. Long as you have lived in Gramercy Park, and eminent in social position and fortune as are the inhabitants of that favored locality, you could not tell within twenty which of the residents in sight of your front door are and which are not entitled to vote; you could not make a list of the legal voters residing on that square which would even approach accuracy. How it must be, then, with the nomadic denizens of our "back slums" and of our great tenement houses—how utterly impossible it is that any one should know which among them are and which are not legal voters, and whether the man who offers to vote at 11 a. m. at one poll has not already voted several times at different polls, and whether he is or is not en his way to vote still oftener at other polls, you cannot help knowing if you would. I can imagine how a man may shut his eyes to many things which he deems it convenient not to know, but I speak of what you must know, however you may wish or seek to be ignorant of it.
>
> The matter to which I call your attention is vital to the very existence of free popular government. Whenever it shall be generally understood that the results of the elections are not determined by the ballots of legal voters, but by frauds in voting or frauds in counting, then the advent of avowed, unequivocal despotism must be near at hand. Between the rule of an emperor and the rule of a clique of ballot-box stuffers, every intelligent man must prefer the former as less rapacious and more responsible. When honest citizens shall avoid the polls, asking "What is the use of voting? the result is already fixed," the days of the Republic will be numbered. Between a ruler who prohibits voting altogether and the gang who make it a sham by filling the ballot-boxes with illegal votes, or miscounting those actually cast, the sway of the former is every way preferable.
> Mr. Tilden, I have been voting here for thirty-seven years, and an active politician for more than thirty of them, and I appeal to God for my sincerity and to my public record for a witness that in all those years I have earnestly sought and labored to have our elections decided by legal votes and none other. Seeing how great are the temptations and the facilities, under a right of suffrage so general as ours, to poll illegal votes, I have openly and actively favored every effort to shut them out and keep the suffrage pure and legal. That every legal voter should have a full and fair opportunity to vote once at each election; that no one should be enabled to vote more than once, and that none but legal voters should be allowed or empowered to vote at all; such has been my constant aim. I have not confined myself to barren professions, but have shown my faith by my works.
> How is it with you? You hold a most responsible and influential position in the councils of a great party. You could make that party content itself with polling legal votes, if you only would. In our late constitutional convention I tried to erect some fresh barrier against election frauds; did you? The very little that I was enabled to effect in this direction I shall try to have ratified by the people at our ensuing election. Will you?
>
> Mr. Tilden, you cannot escape responsibility by saying, with the guilty Macbeth—
>
> "Thou canst not say I did it; never shake
> Those gory locks at me!"
> for you were at least a passive accomplice in the giant frauds of last November. Your name was used, without public protest on your part, in circulars sowed broadcast over the State, whereof the manifest intent was to "make assurance double sure" that the frauds here perpetrated should not be overborne by the honest vote of the rural district. And you, not merely by silence, but by positive assumption, have covered those frauds with the mantle of your respectability. On the principle that "the receiver is as bad as the thief," you are as deeply implicated in them to-day as though your name were Tweed, O'Brien, or Oakey Hall.

Let us consider just where we are and what are our responsibilities! When the country is in a state of perfect tranquillity and peace; when no foreign enemies menace our shores, or domestic violence and internal strife run riot through the land; when a long series of business depressions and a widespread stagnation of commercial interests and trade are slowly but gradually giving way to a healthier tone in public sentiment and a renewed prosperity along all the lines of our diversified business affairs; when the executive and judicial departments of the Government are being exercised with the broadest and truest statesmanship, infusing new life into the body-politic by its reforms in the public service, the rigid enforcement of the law, the speedy punishment of crimes, and its successful solution of the great financial problems of the age, that aside from any political considerations, challenge the respect and admiration not only of our own people, but of the world—while all these conditions prevail, the President of the United States, by the power vested in him by the Constitution and under an imperative and acknowledged necessity for the support and maintenance of the Government, has been compelled to convene this Congress in extra session. And, Mr. Chairman, why? Not because any extraordinary emergency has arisen in public affairs, not because any general legislation is needed to protect and preserve all our rights of person and property, but because the dominant political party in this House in the Forty-fifth Congress, under the imperial dictation of a party caucus, refused to pass two of the appropriation bills necessary for the support and maintenance of the Government unless there was ingrafted within its provisions the repeal of certain statutes, statutes about the wisdom of which I concede conscientious and patriotic men may honestly differ in sentiment, but statutes the abrogation of which at this time, or before the convening of the regular session of this Congress, no gentleman on the floor of this House, in debate, on the rostrum, or in the public press of the country, has ever dared to raise his voice or wield his pen in the utterance or statement that a single inalienable right of a single individual under the Constitution or the laws would be jeopardized or imperiled.

I summarize the statement that in no State of this Union, except the State of California, is there to be or can there be a general election wherein these sections of the statutes sought to be repealed are applicable before the regular session of this Congress, on the first Monday of December next. Then why this unseemly haste? Why this precipitation of legislation upon the country? Why this unnecessary expense levied upon a people long suffering with onerous local, municipal, and State taxation? I venture a reply. I read it in the democratic party press of the country. I hear it gossiped on the street corners, in the lobbies of the hotels, and in the corridors of the Capitol. The great and wise men on the other side of the House, in language susceptible of no misinterpretation, and with eloquence in style and diction have, on repeated occasions during the discussion of this bill, afforded us unmistakable evidences of their partisan purposes and designs.

I am not trusting to memory, Mr. Chairman, or a fancied imagination in making these statements. Look back over the history of this debate in the RECORD and judge for yourselves. You will find that on the 3d day of March last a very distinguished Representative from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] representing now for the sixth term a highly enlightened and patriotic constituency, a gentleman ripe in age and culture, and whose locks have whitened in the congressional service of his country, in the debate upon this bill, referring to the deputy marshals appointed at the South at elections, used the following language:

They are generally men who have very little standing, often illiterate colored men, or, if white, those who have not ordinarily as much brains as would lie upon your thumb-nail. Let me say to you in all truth, however unpalatable it may be to republican taste, that these white men who are opposed to our people and willing to officiate in this capacity are under the ban of society.

And again, the same distinguished representative of his party, in the second edition of his invaluable political ethics, at this session of Congress and upon this very subject, said:

I beg leave to call the attention of the House for a moment to the practical effects of this law in the Southern States, but more especially in Louisiana and Mississippi. I premise my remarks upon this point by the statement that a large majority of white men of intelligence and respectability belong to the democratic party in these States. The few that are outside of it and are seeking to stir up race antagonism are under the ban of society. They hate the democratic party, and are not loved in return.

What distinguished statesmanship, what considerate and philanthropic utterances read in the light of our history of the past twenty years. "Under the ban of society!" What society? Has Mississippi or the cotton States an unwritten law that prescribes the social standing of their white race according to birth, family, or wealth? I believe not, for I very cheerfully bear witness, both at their domestic firesides and elsewhere, of their refined courtesy, their uniform politeness, and their proverbial and unbounded hospitality.

No, Mr. Chairman, it is not this. The proper interpretation of the remarks I have quoted, the true sentiment therein expressed, leads to far more disastrous and alarming conclusions; it goes to the political rights of a large number of our fellow-citizens; to the gradual disfranchisement of the colored race, and the political outlawry of the white population at the South who believe, in and have the courage to proclaim the tenets of the republican faith, and who from a pure devotion to conscience and principle refuse to be dragooned into a solid South. The "ban of society" is a political ban that allows no conscience, brooks no teaching, courts no charity, and knows no law.

And again, Mr. Chairman, another loyal democratic statesman from the same State, [Mr. CHALMERS,] in the debate on the Army bill, April 1, said:

This Government for the last eighteen years has been reeling like a drunken man. It has rocked like a ship at sea without chart, compass, or rudder. The unbridled will of a mere despotic majority has bid defiance to law and Constitution. Bribery and corruption have held high carnival in the Halls of Congress, and reckless and criminal extravagance have permeated every branch of the Government. It is time that the old ship was righted up; that the officers and crew, drunk with power, debauched by the continuance of licentious indulgences, should be driven out and replaced by purer and better men.

And again, upon the same occasion, referring to the late civil war and its results:

You sent grand armies after us. You hemmed us in by land and by sea. You not only threatened to shoot but you shot us to death. With the battle-cry upon your lips of the Constitution as it is and the Union as it was, you rallied the whole North without regard to party in defense of the old flag, and when the battle was won you tore off the veil that covered your hideous deformity; you dissolved the Union that you had saved; you changed the Constitution of our fathers for which you had pretended to fight; you changed State sovereignties into military provinces; you converted the constitutional Union by usurpation into almost a military despotism presided over by a successful military chieftain; you organized returning boards that stole State governments and ended in stealing the Presidency itself.

What a terrific arraignment, not only of the republican party but of the loyal men of this country, (who, thank God, were and are still found in all parties and in all States,) by that Spartan confederate hero of Fort Pillow. Mark the lamentations! "Reeling like a drunken man;" "bribery and corruption in the Halls of Congress;" "drunk with power;" "replaced by purer and better men." The wretch that drew Priam's curtain in the dead of night and informed him his Troy was sacked could not have been more scared and terrified than were the eminent and distinguished men of this country when they heard or read these burning words that welled from such an ethereal source.

I have quoted from the speeches of two of Mississippi's illustrious sons. I must supplement it by reading an extract from her contemporaneous press, already a part of the records of this House. I read from the Southern States, a paper published at Okolona, Mississippi:

Yes, thank God, we have captured the Capitol, and in 1880 our man will walk up the White House steps and take his seat in the presidential chair. Then will our glorious triumph be complete; then will we proceed to tear your amendments from the Constitution and trample them in the mire; then will we break the shackles you have forged for the free, sovereign, and independent Commonwealths of the Union; then will we recognize the right of secession, a right that is not dead, but sleeping; then we will decorate the Capitol with the pictures of Davis and Lee and Stuart and all the glorious leaders of a cause that is not lost, but living still. Yes, thank God, we have captured the Capitol, and from that coigne of vantage we propose to rule the Republic in a way that will make your radical laws and your radical leaders forever odious in America.

I can only add the significant and expressive couplet:

You may break, you may shatter the vase, if you will,
But the scent of the roses will hang round it still.

Again, Mr. Chairman, an honorable gentleman [Mr. Fleming] from Georgia, a State that is represented to-day and has been in the past by such distinguished men, in the course of his remarks on this amendment, February 25 of the present year, said:

It is no answer to say that the act of Congress makes the offense an offense against the United States. That is precisely what we complain of—that it deprives the State of jurisdiction and confers it upon the United States, and in this way interferes with the right of local self-government. Although it be an election for Congress it is still a State election, held in the State and by the State, and conducted and presided over by State officers. Offenders at such an election ought surely to be tried under the laws of the State, and to deprive the State of jurisdiction is a palpable interference with the right of local self-government. In this point of view the issue before us is the great issue that will be before us in 1880, upon which, in my judgment, will depend the existence of free institutions in this country, the right of local self government, the continuance of constitutional liberty. Am I asked how is it that these issues will be before the country in 1880 any more than in elections that are past? I reply, let facts answer. Is it not a fact that there is a strong movement in the republican party to return General Grant to the White House?

And again, that very eminent lawyer and favorite son of Tennessee, [Mr. BRIGHT,] in a well-considered speech in this House during the present session in the debate on the Army bill, said:

The man it is said is in training abroad now; he has been feasted and ovated in Europe by the bondholders and creditors of the United States who wish a strong Government to chain the people down to their dungeon floor and to flay them with taxation, and in response to their complaints to give them the bayonet. Under the instigation of those men you will find that there is a candidate in training for the presidential race. He will land at the golden gates of the Pacific; he will find a splendid palace car to receive him and will be met by shouting thousands. They will shout hosannas to the returning hero; some perhaps so abandoned they will throw up their hats and render homage to an American Cæsar.

And again, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. KIMMEL,] having for his constituency a portion of that proud and beautiful city of Baltimore, on the 19th of February last, during the debate on this bill, made the following doleful remarks:

Every indication proclaims the coming struggle. The messages of the President, the reports of the Secretary of War, the Burnside bill, the renewal of the unholy appeal to sectional prejudices, the restoration to places of power of the men who shamefully led the carnival of extravagance and crime which so degraded the people as to fit them to accept the usurpation of 1876 and 1877, and, above all, the candidacy of General Grant, emphasize the impending shock. Flattered by the attentions of courts and kings, who may see in his surroundings, tendencies, and capabilities the means by which may be obscured the governmental example which undermines their thrones, this spoiled child of fortune returns to the land of Washington, to spurn the example which made Washington immortal by entering upon a campaign for a third presidential term.

This, then, is the political nightmare that "frights the souls" of our democratic statesmen. I charge it here, upon my sincere belief and responsibility, that the proposed repeal of these statutes by the party majority of this House, at this time and in this manner, is not in the interests of a fair ballot, an honest count, and a free election; but is, as indicated in the speeches I have quoted from and according to the general tenor of this debate, in the interests of democratic ascendency and success in the presidential campaign of 1880. Go on, gentlemen; hesitate not in your wild career; abrogate, as you have in part, the wholesome rules and regulations of this House; introduce bills on all subjects and kinds of legislation through the petition-box, if you cannot do it otherwise, and allow certain committees to make reports at any time; cripple, if you can, the commercial and business interests of the country by tinkering with the tariff, destroying the national banks and their circulation, and giving us new laws upon finance and the currency; prolong this extra session of Congress until the summer sun shall dry up our mountain streams and wither the green grass that now freshens the beautiful lawns of the Capitol; repeal these laws under consideration, and if perchance the Executive, influenced by a wise discretion and judgment, should exercise his constitutional prerogative by interposing a veto, consummate your threats and revolutionary schemes by refusing to vote the needed supplies.

Not only inaugurate, as you have done in these Halls of Congress, the presidential campaign of 1880, but advance the picket-line in your unholy party crusade, fling your political banner to the breeze, and inscribe in golden letters on its waving folds your chivalric motto, "A solid South." Crystallize the incongruous forces and opposing factions of that cipher-telegraphic modern democracy that yields to no temptation, prates "in season and out of season" its own immaculate virtue in the administration of public affairs, and stands upon that hybrid party platform of hard money in the East, soft money in the West, and political outlawry in the South. Assemble and parade your late confederate major-generals, your brigadiers, your colonels, and your captains, and issue your General Orders No. 1 to the South that you have "captured the Capitol," and No. 2 to the North that you are reconstructed and want "peace and reconciliation." Characterize the election of 1876 and the constitutional majority therein expressed by the verdict of a free people as an "usurpation" and a "fraud." Draw a veil over the history of the late rebellion, if you can, and let the loyal minds and hearts of the country forget, if they will, their vast contributions of treasure, the sacrifice of a million lives of the best blood in the land, and the desolation of thousands of happy homes for the maintenance and preservation of constitutional Government and the Union. Reproach in the choicest language of your democratic vocabulary, as you have done, some of the wisest and purest statesmen of the country, who have recently been called by an appreciative constituency "to places of power." Stigmatize and revile the greatest general of the age, who led the Union armies to victory; traduce his personal character; disparage his late administration; scoff at his foreign travels for recreation and culture; talk loudly about "imperialism," "centralizing policy," and "ruins of the Republic" in connection therewith. You are only erecting a monument to your own consummate folly; you are arousing the popular will of a free and thinking people; you are cementing into an active, vigorous life the vital elements of a tremendous political power that will solidly close up the rank and file in the republican column and march to political victory in 1880 as triumphantly as Sherman "marched to the sea"—a victory foreshadowed in the light of coming events; a victory that will give to the whole people and the whole country a President honored and revered alike at home and among all the nations of the earth; a President invincible in arms, patriotic in peace, competent and honest in official life, and pre-eminently possessed of that decision of purpose and character so illustriously displayed on that Sunday made memorable in American history at Appomattox.

You may style all these proceedings and this manner of legislation, statesmanship; you may brand it with the imposing sentiment "constitutional liberty;" you may claim for yourselves and your party all the virtues of the decalogue: but what sensible man, woman, or child who believes in the intelligence, loyalty, and patriotism of a free people will mistake the issue or the result? I leave it to impartial history to vindicate the truth and inscribe on its enduring pages the supreme folly and everlasting shame of this proposed democratic legislation.

We are entering upon the second century of our national life. We love our common country and our Constitution. We revere and honor our great men who have gone before us but whose memories are still fresh and green in the hearts of a grateful people. We esteem and admire our living heroes, whether in private or official life. We love the old flag with its stars and stripes that has been trailed but never dishonored—the flag of our fathers, and I trust of our children's children, that floats so peacefully and proudly to-day from every home of the North and South and East and West; that every breeze of heaven lifts and nightly dews baptize, the first sunbeams of morning and the last of evening kiss, and that with its living memories and its loyal loving hopes is "sacred next to our faith and our God."

Mr. COVERT. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to take any part in this discussion. I had been quite content that the issue should go before the country upon the arguments submitted by other gentlemen upon either side of this Chamber. I have been a close observer and a patient hearer of this debate from its inception, and I have been quite willing that the country should judge where the merits of the discussion rest. Ours is a nation of readers and our readers read between the lines. They will search in vain, sir, for argument in support of the retention of these laws—their further existence—in suggestions which have been indulged in by the other side as to possible weaknesses in the Constitution which has stood the test of a century's trial; to the history of slavery; to reminiscences of the rebellion; to unmanly and uncalled-for references to the presence of "rebel brigadiers" and "ex-confederate colonels" upon this floor. They will search in vain for suggestions pertinent to this discussion in laudatory references to Grant, and prophecies as to the campaign of 1880—such as have characterized the speech of my colleague [Mr. BAILEY] who has just taken his seat. Our readers, reading the lines and between the lines, will pay much more regard and give much greater weight to the calm, dispassionate expositions which have come up from this side of the House upon the constitutional law governing this question, the absolute right of the sovereign States to control their elections under the Constitution without Federal interposition.

I would have made no effort, sir, to secure recognition but for the fact that the recent illness of my distinguished colleague, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] upon whose motion the Judiciary Committee of the last Congress investigated the methods pursued under color of this law in the city of New York, has thus far prevented him from speaking upon this question; and that in the natural anxiety of so many members to discuss the matter, my colleagues upon this side may perhaps find themselves without opportunity to voice here the sentiments upon this proposition of a large body of the people of our State.

I venture, under these circumstances, to detain the committee for a brief space only in the presentation of a few facts gleaned from the report of the committee to which I have referred.

I have no hesitation in saying, sir, that if no other reason existed, if no consideration of constitutional law entered into the question, the facts elicited by the sworn testimony taken by this committee ought and ought alone to be sufficient to bring about the repeal of this measure now under discussion.

Had I not determined to present these facts without criticism and without comment, I should say that political history nowhere presents darker or more infamous pages than those wherein this testimony is recorded—the story of the shame and disgrace inflicted under color of Federal authority upon citizens of the sovereign State of New York.

So far back as 1869 the question was raised as to the legality of naturalization papers issued during the preceding year in the city of New York.

The methods pursued in granting naturalization had been the same before all the judges, and were in every respect the methods which had obtained during ten years prior to 1868, and which were in fact followed down to 1874. A uniform kind of deposition was used alike in the various courts of the State having power to act in the matter. An index was kept by the clerk of the court granting naturalization, in which was made the various necessary entries: the name of the person naturalized, the country from whence he came, and the names and residences of his witnesses.

The claim made so early as 1869 was that every naturalization paper issued from the supreme and superior courts of New York, with the exception of six, was illegal and void for the reason that no entry had been made by the clerks of the courts, in the formal court minutes, of the granting of the certificates.

From time to time since 1869, upon occasions of elections, Commissioner Davenport had caused voters holding these 1868 certificates to be challenged at the polls, and had in some instances taken away their papers of naturalization. Ten years rolled by. Not an arrest was made and no effort was instituted to have the legality of these certificates tested. Not until one year ago, in the spring of 1878, was it determined to make a wholesale crusade upon the holders of these 1868 certificates. Last summer, and late in the season, complaints were made against nearly every voter who had registered in the election of 1876, in New York City, upon these certificates—aggregating about ten thousand people. Over two thousand warrants were issued under these complaints. Some three hundred persons were arrested and brought before the commissioner. They were there told they had been guilty of a felony, but would not be punished if their naturalization papers were surrendered. When they made the surrender of their papers they were discharged. Not a single man of them all was indicted, and still no attempt was made by Davenport or by any person in authority or claiming authority to try or test the validity or legality of these certificates.

The autocrat of the New York ballot-box floated in an atmosphere of political delight. In the excess of his satisfaction he wrote to the Attorney-General of the United States detailing what he had done—advising the highest law officer of the country, the legal adviser of the President—that all the certificates granted in the two courts I have mentioned in 1868 were illegal, and that by prompt action he could obtain the surrender of the certificates before election. The Attorney-General, however, to his credit be it stated, refused to adopt the views presented, and replied to this notification of the chief supervisor in these terms. Let me read:

> It does not seem to me proper that criminal proceedings should be commenced which are not intended to be pursued and are not intended to result in any punishment, the only object being to induce these persons to give up their certificates. If they have been guilty of any offense they are to be prosecuted and punished. If not, the criminal process is not to be used for any other but its legitimate purpose of punishing offenders.

This announcement might seem to be a check upon the further operations of the chief supervisor, but it did not prove so. Davenport was "Sir Oracle," and a few months later, at his suggestion, the United States district attorney for that district published a notice to the effect that inasmuch as it was alleged that many persons were fraudulently possessed of naturalization papers, such persons could avoid arrest and prosecution by appearing before the commissioner and surrendering such certificates if they should appear fraudulent. Under this notice three thousand foreign-born citizens, fearing molestation, with the dread of legal difficulty and of personal trouble which was held up before them, gave up their papers of naturalization.

Mr. McCOOK. Did not all of those men who surrendered their certificates of naturalization sign a deposition stating distinctly and clearly that they knew what they were about?

Mr. COVERT. I will answer my colleague's question. I am not prepared to say that that is the case. On the contrary, I think my colleague is mistaken in the assumption that all the persons who surrendered their papers signed a certificate to that effect; but I call the attention of my colleague and the attention of the House and the country to the testimony upon that topic as embodied in the report of the Judiciary Committee. The witnesses appeared upon the stand, and then, when the same question was propounded to them which has been propounded by my colleague to me, they said almost with one voice that in no instance was this clause of this so-called deposition read to them, and they had no knowledge whatever of the fact that they had been asked to sign any such statement. That was the testimony before the committee.

Mr. FRYE. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. COVERT. My time is limited. I have soon to yield the floor, and cannot yield further; more particularly, if the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] will allow me to say so, because he possibly interrupts me to advertise the Okolona States, of which paper he seems to be the agent on this floor. [Laughter.] I beg to assure the gentleman I do not want to subscribe for the paper. [Laughter.]

Mr. FRYE. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. COVERT. I cannot yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. COVERT. Possibly this was not intimidation. Possibly no intimidation was used in the cases of these three thousand men but slightly acquainted with our forms and rules of law. But in the face of the proclamation of the United States district attorney, hinting at "arrest" and "prosecution," but one view, it seems to me, can be taken of the matter. But there were those who wanted a legal test other than the ipse dixit of Davenport applied to these papers. Three adopted German citizens, all of whom had been told by Davenport that their certificates were illegal because their issuance was not entered in the court minutes, applied to the superior court of New York by formal proceedings for a correction of the record in this respect, so that every demand of the commissioner might be fully complied with.

Formal notice of the argument of this motion was given to the district attorney and to the commissioner, but neither of them attended upon the hearing. Judge Friedman, after full examination of the matters submitted, denied the motion to correct, holding, in an elaborate opinion, that at best the point suggested was a technical error, that it affected every naturalization in that court from 1858 to 1873, over forty thousand in number, including one thousand women.

Mr. Davenport had no more regard for this judgment of the court than for the judgment of the Attorney-General, for, incredible as it may seem, on the very afternoon of the day that this opinion was delivered he telegraphed to the supervisors and marshals in each district to pay no attention to it.

For consistent hardihood in desperate daring, for absolute and supreme disregard of all law, for perfect and entire independence of the decrees of courts, Mr. Commissioner Davenport is entitled, it seems to me, to the most conspicuous place that can be assigned to any American citizen in contemporaneous history!

Not in scattered and remote sections where shot-guns are alleged to be carried to the polls; not where the color line is alleged to be drawn; not where a weak and ignorant and helpless race are alleged to be at the mercy of their more powerful white neighbors; but in the peerless city of New York, the metropolis which is the boast and pride of this Republic, these acts occurred, and further indignities were inflicted upon the rights and upon the persons of citizens.

Not only were supervisors of elections instructed to pay no regard to the decision I have quoted, but on the same day they were told whenever the holders of these certificates offered to register to take from them their certificates and forward them to the chief supervisor. And in obedience to these orders, these papers were taken from nearly two thousand people who presented themselves at the places of registry for the purpose of registration.

Think of this, Representatives of the people! Think of this, you who profess to believe in the binding force of the fourth amendment to the Constitution:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searchers and seizures, shall not be violated.

After Judge Friedman's decision, and with full knowledge of it, just before the fall election in 1878, Davenport directed a clerk in his employment, and who was also a deputy marshal, to swear to complaints against every man who had registered in 1878 upon the certificates issued in 1868 except the six whose naturalization was entered in full in the minutes of the court.

These complaints alleged the belief by the complainant that a crime had been committed; but, as he himself admits upon his examination, he had no personal knowledge whatever of the person complained against; had no conversation with the supervisors who furnished information as to the registry, and, with the exception of the two hundred and fifty complaints which he himself filled up, out of three thousand one hundred, he knew absolutely nothing as to the truth or falsity of any one fact stated in the complaint so sworn to. These complaints were verified on the Sunday and Monday preceding the election, and upon them Davenport issued warrants of arrest.

Where did the crime come in? Where was the criminal intent? To make them criminals the holders of these certificates must have guilty knowledge of the improper character of the certificates, and no averment of this guilty knowledge appeared in the complaint. On the contrary, under the only judicial decision which had been rendered in the matter, they had every reason to suppose that the certificates were regular and valid.

How were these warrants executed? In many instances they were given to deputy marshals, who in some cases placed them in the hands of republican supervisors of election detailed to overlook the ballot-boxes at the various polling places. Whenever any of these voters came to deposit his ballot the supervisor, if he wanted the man arrested, would hand the warrant to a deputy marshal, and the victim would be taken from the polls and into the presence of the chief supervisor. Over six hundred persons were taken in this way before that officer, who on the day of election held regal sway as a "court" in the Federal building in which the post-office is located.

The scene here, as detailed by the statements of sworn witnesses, almost beggars description. In the iron cage or pen used for the detention of criminals, at times crowded to its utmost capacity, were all descriptions of people—the decent, respectable voter crowded by the drunken, filthy wretch with whom contact meant contagion. The hearing before the commissioner was short, sharp, and decisive. If the prisoners had not voted they were required to promise they would abstain from doing so before they were discharged.

And all this in the face of the notification of the Attorney-General to the commissioner that the criminal process was not to be used "for any other but the legitimate purpose of punishing offenders."

I have not the patience to follow this matter any further. I have not the time to speculate as to the number of honest voters of foreign birth who were intimidated by these high-handed proceedings from going near the polls on the day of election. The testimony adduced before the committee bears its own comment. I commend to every Representative here, to every lover of constitutional liberty in the land, to every man who values fairness, to every one who yields respect to the decrees of courts, to every man who believes in the right of free election, the testimony taken in New York by the Judiciary Committee of the Forty-fifth Congress.

It is not possible, Mr. Chairman, that proceedings like these can continue unchallenged and uncontrolled in the metropolitan city of this free Republic. It is not possible that the plain provision of a constitutional amendment giving to every person protection from unreasonable seizure of persons and papers is to be scornfully disregarded. It is not possible, sir, that the solemn adjudication of a State court of record is to be laughed at and openly defied by a Federal officer when that court has full jurisdiction of the subject-matter determined.

And finally, sir, when scenes like these are enacted in the city of New York, and when they may occur in every city and in every State throughout the length and breadth of this land under color of this law, it is not possible that any conscientious lover of that Constitution which gives to the several States the right to enact their own election laws and to establish the qualifications of their voters—it is not possible that any lover of this Constitution can relax any and every lawful effort to secure the repeal of these enactments.

Men talk, sir, of the presence of the Army at the polls. This House has voted to repeal the law which permits their presence there. Army officers are emphatically gentlemen by birth or breeding or by association and education. They are not the character of men who would permit, if they could avoid it perhaps, the occurrence of disreputable acts at the polls or any unnecessary interference with the rights of the voter. It is the spirit of intimidation suggested by the presence of soldiery at the ballot-box rather than the personnel of these agents that is objectionable. But to the presence at the polls of a swarm of supervisors and marshals the objection goes further. It is not only the intimidation which is born of their presence and their acts, but it is to the character of these civic officials that the objection extends. To great extent they seem to have no characters to lose; they, as in the case of Mosier, in New York, do not hesitate to swear to complaints embodying facts of the existence of which they know nothing; they have no appreciation of the high and almost sacred character of the work they are called upon to supervise. The country had better, it seems to me, a hundredfold countenance the presence of armed troops at the polls, at little additional expense to the people, rather than the costly presence of the Davenports, the Mosiers, and the thousands more of unarmed, perhaps, but still more powerful and dangerous supervisors and deputy marshals.

The vast majority of the people of this country have determined that these offensive laws shall be repealed, not violently, not by revolutionary measures, in the popular acceptation of the term, but by the moral force of overwhelming public sentiment. I have faith to believe that the people see and understand the danger which surrounds them, the condition so aptly described by De Tocqueville in his "Democracy in America." That observant author says, in substance, that revolutions are not what he most fears for the people of this Republic. It is rather their disposition to shut themselves within the narrow circle of domestic interests to such an extent as to ultimately become inaccessible to those great and powerful public emotions which perturb nations but which enlarge and recruit them. He expresses the fear that the people of this land may arrive at such a state as to regard every new theory as a peril, every social improvement as a stepping-stone to revolution, and that they may refuse to move altogether for fear of being moved too far.

Is it possible, sir, that this fear, expressed so many years ago by a profound and impartial observer of our institutions, is about to be realized? God grant that this may not be so, and that neither revolution nor sluggish inaction and unconcern may affect the permanency and prosperity of the Republic.

The majority of the people, speaking through their agents in this Congress, purpose to repeal these sections of existing law. They realize that the occasion which rendered this legislation seemingly necessary has gone by. They begin to believe, with the author of the History of Civilization in England, that—

> The most valuable additions made to legislation have been enactments destructive of preceding legislation, and the best laws which have been passed have been those by which some former laws were repealed. * * * The concession merely consists in this: the legislators have retraced their own steps and undone their own work. If we examine the policy of the most humane and enlightened governments we shall find this to be the course they have pursued. The whole scope and tendency of modern legislation is to restore things to that natural channel from which the ignorance of preceding legislation has driven them. This is one of the great works of the present age; and if legislators do it well they will deserve the gratitude of mankind.

And this is a part of the great work which the majority of the people, represented by the democratic members of this Congress, have determined to do, so far as they have the legal power to do it.

Not a man on this side of this House whose conscience does not call him and urge him to this work; not a man here but who believes that this call comes to him as the call of duty. And as fully as he may—as completely as in him lies—every democratic Representative here will do his part in the attempt at least to repeal these odious and unconstitutional enactments, holding himself responsible for his action to the people whom he represents and to the God in whose name he has sworn to discharge as well as he may the duties of the people's agent upon this floor.

Mr. GEDDES. I will yield three minutes of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MULDROW.]

Mr. MULDROW. Some days ago the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] made reference to certain indorsements which he claimed had been made of the Okolona States, a paper published in Mississippi, and which, through the gentleman from Maine, has become quite notorious in this country. In the allusion which that gentleman made to that paper, which he insisted reflected southern political sentiment, he uses this language:

The paper which I received this morning actually bristles all over with indorsements of papers all over the South and indorsements from political friends.

He further says in regard to it:

I say that it is my right and not illiberal, and not unjust to the gentleman from Kentucky, to cite here to the House no words of mine, only the words of this paper published in the State of Mississippi; only the words of this editor, as I said, indorsed by score upon score of papers in the South.

Now, I did not believe it possible for the gentleman from Maine, in his partisan fervor to make capital for his political party, to have made declarations which a mere recital of the facts will show to have been so reckless. In the first place, the paper to which he refers in citing these indorsements which it claims, cites more articles of laudation, or, if not more, quite a number of articles of laudation, from republican and not democratic papers.

The gentleman from Maine says that the paper he received bristled all over with indorsements of papers in the South. There was not a single indorsement of a single sentiment uttered or promulgated by that paper since this controversy began. The editor himself confesses that these indorsements are from newspapers printed in the years 1875, 1876, 1877, and 1878, and not a single indorsement from any paper in the South since these recent articles have been published in that paper which have given it so much notoriety.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MULDROW. One minute more. To show what is the feeling with regard to that paper in Mississippi, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read a resolution recently adopted by the democratic executive committee of the very county in which it is published. The resolution is from the Messenger, a democratic newspaper published at Okolona.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That we indorse the statements of Colonel H. L. MULDROW, our Representative in Congress, recently made in a debate in Congress, as to the conservative sentiments of the people of Mississippi, and that the Southern States, a newspaper published in the town of Okolona, "does not represent the sentiments of the democracy of Mississippi."

Mr. MULDROW. All I desire to add in connection with that is that I think whenever the gentleman seeks to rekindle the fire of sectional discord for the benefit of his party he should quote from papers whose laudation comes from democrats and not from republicans, as in this instance.

Mr. FRYE. One moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GEDDES. Being a new member of this House, I doubted the propriety of participating in this discussion [laughter] knowing that the time would be profitably employed by more experienced members.

Mr. FRYE. One moment.

Mr. GEDDES. Other considerations, however——

Mr. FRYE. That is the courage of the democratic side of the House. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COVERT] and other gentlemen make their flings, and then shut the door to any reply. That is courage, that is chivalry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] to permit the Chair to ask the consent of the committee that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] may be heard a few minutes without taking it from the time of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GEDDES. I yield cheerfully for that.

Mr. THOMPSON. I move that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] be allowed three minutes, the time allowed the gentleman from Mississippi.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from Maine proceeding? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. FRYE. I thank the Chairman for this that he did not permit these statements to be made without a chance for a brief reply. He would not do as the gentleman from New York who has just sat down, [Mr. COVERT,] make a fling at a colleague on the floor of the House and then close the door so that he could make no reply. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] has had an extract read from a paper published in his district, a copy of which I have also received, so that it appears I am not the advertising agent alone of the Okolona States.

Mr. MULDROW. Permit me one moment.

Mr. FRYE. What is it?

Mr. MULDROW. I would ask the gentleman if he has not also received a circular from the Okolona States requesting him to post it in a public place in order to aid the circulation of that paper?

Mr. FRYE. I never had but one letter from the gentleman who edits the Okolona States, and that is the one I caused to be read the other day.

Mr. MULDROW. I am not talking about a letter, I am talking about a printed circular.

Mr. FRYE. No, sir; I have received no printed circular. I would not myself engage in circulating such poison as is published in that paper. But the gentleman has had read an extract from another paper published in that district—an opposition paper—and says that that represents the sentiments of the democracy.

Now I want to read an extract from that paper. [Laughter and applause on the republican side.] It is from the same issue from which the gentleman took his clipping. It is this:

We admire General Chalmers as much as any member we have in Congress. Indeed—

That was the General CHALMERS who made the speech to which I replied the other day, and who made such charges against the northern people of this country.

Mr. SAMFORD. That gentleman is not now in his seat.

Mr. FRYE. I read:

Indeed we think he comes nearer saying the right thing at the right time than almost any member from the South, and for this reason, we earnestly protest against the recent attempt of the Bourbons to injure him and impair his usefulness by covering him with fulsome praise. They tried detraction and denunciation until they discovered, (hard as they are to learn anything,) that such a course on their part was beneficial to the "Little Game Cock," and now they have changed tactics and would have the world believe CHALMERS is one of them. No such thing; CHALMERS is a conservative democrat—

That is, a southern conservative!—

CHALMERS is a conservative democrat who is popular enough to be elected in a district having an overwhelming negro majority.

Mr. MULDROW. I should like to ask the gentlemen a question right here.

Mr. FRYE. Wait a minute.

Mr. MULDROW. If the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MULDROW. I ask the gentleman this question: I ask him to put his finger upon a single sentiment or to cite a single utterance which has emanated from the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] upon this floor which is not conservative.

Mr. FRYE. The House and the country have the speech of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Now, I wish to take an indorsement of the same gentleman from the Okolona States (which the gentleman from New York [Mr. COVERT] said I had advertised) to see whether the two papers do not run in the same current; whether they do not eat their soup out of the same bowl with the same spoon. [Laughter and applause on the republican side.]

That recent speech of Hon. J. R. CHALMERS, on the use of troops at the polls, will thrill the South to the very core of its heart. It was grand, it was great, it was the speech of the crisis. Mississippi is proud of her brigadier. Cheers for CHALMERS!

Mr. MULDROW. I insist that the gentleman shall——

Mr. FRYE. Right below it in the same connection is the following:

The men who unleashed the hounds of war upon our people in the name of "Union" were traitors, and they must be branded as traitors before the world and damned to the depths with the Benedict Arnolds who opposed secession and secessionists in the days of the Revolution.

[Laughter and applause on the republican side.]

So much for the two papers. Now for the Okolona States. Some gentleman has handed me, I do not know who, but I presume it is correct——

Mr. MULDROW. Was he a democrat or a republican?

Mr. FRYE. A statement of the Okolona States's circulation, which shows that it has increased its circulation since 1874 127 per cent.

Mr. VANCE. But what circulation did it start with?

Mr. FRYE. It has to-day, he states, as large a circulation in its county as any paper in any southern county outside of some large city.

Mr. MULDROW. I wish to say a word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MULDROW. My question in reference to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] whose utterances the gentleman from Maine has stated are incendiary and revolutionary, has not been answered. He has referred to no sentiment of the gentleman from Mississippi which shows the statement he has made can be substantiated. I will say further that the quotation which the gentleman from Maine has just made comes from the same paper which recently has become so popular with the republican party.

Mr. GEDDES. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to be considered as wanting in courtesy, and I declined to yield to the gentleman from Maine simply because of the limited time allowed me. But as we are charged with being wanting in chivalry, I notice that when a similar appeal was made to the other side the other day, a gentleman there said, "Not now, sit down!"

Mr. SAMFORD. There were two or three of them said the same thing.

Mr. GEDDES. Mr. Chairman, being a new member of this House, I have doubted the propriety of participating in this discussion, knowing the time could be more profitably employed by the more experienced members. Other considerations, however, have induced me to ask the indulgence of all for a short time.

We all appear to realize the magnitude of the questions before us and the responsibilities resting upon us, but the able and exhaustive arguments already submitted, with those coming after me, will, I have no doubt, enable us and the country to reach a safe conclusion.

From our stand-point personal and civil liberty seems to be imperiled. It appears to be a struggle for the maintenance of popular government. In such a contest every pulsation of my heart beats in unison with the interests of the people.

This is not the first time these questions have been considered in this country. They divided political parties in the infancy of our Government, and have frequently since agitated the public mind and the judgment of the American people required in reference to them. They are still vital to our political well-being.

These laws under consideration should be repealed on three grounds:

1. They are unconstitutional.

2. The purely partisan purposes to which they have been and can be applied.

3. They are vicious and impolitic in principle.

I shall only attempt to discuss briefly the last-named proposition; the others have been unanswerably established.

The republican party having obtained and for long years held absolute, almost unlimited control of the Government of this country, could and did exercise the power of fastening upon the people measures that have produced countless evils, and still threaten more serious consequences.

This gives rise to the questions pending before us, and they must be decided in view of our accountability to that great tribunal—public opinion—from which there is no appeal but to our own consciences and our God. The final result before a liberty-loving people, capable of self-government, cannot be doubtful.

We must, then, as their representatives, enter upon and carry out this grand, patriotic work of real reconstruction of the laws on the basis of the Constitution, with the same dignified, dispassionate, and unconquerable spirit that animated and guided the founders of our institutions. To do this many of the idols of the republican party must be demolished. Precious principles long neglected and contemned must be restored. We must return to the political landmarks of the fathers. The paradise of government practically subverted by the vicious legislation during republican rule must be regained. As Moses the leader of God's chosen people took the molten calf which the people had made of the golden ear-rings of their wives and daughters, and burnt it in the fire and ground it to powder, and strewed it upon the water, so must we utterly destroy this ruinous legislation of the past. We must start out and travel along the broad, plain highway of constitutional liberty.

I am alarmed and tremble for my country when I find a respectable minority—men of gigantic intellect and wielding immense influence—vigorously and persistently struggling to maintain upon our statute-book a species of legislation seriously at war with popular government. It certainly is in the direction—unintentionally I trust—of a monarchical form of government. Will it not recall to the public mind the action and spirit of men who aroused the patriotic apprehensions of General Washington at an early period, when he wrote to Mr. Jay, saying:

> What astonishing changes a few years are capable of producing! I am told that even respectable characters speak of a monarchical form of government without horror. From thinking proceeds speaking; thence to acting is often but a single step. But how irrevocable and tremendous! What a triumph for our enemies to verify their predictions! What a triumph for the advocates of despotism to find that we are incapable of governing ourselves and that systems founded on the basis of equal liberty are merely ideal and fallacious! Would to God that wise measures may be taken in time to avert the consequences we have but too much reason to apprehend.

These words of wisdom and undying love of freedom come to my mind and heart at this time as peculiarly appropriate, and in my action I desire to heed them.

Much of the legislation of the Federal Government during the time the republican party held unlimited control of our affairs and guided the destinies of this mighty Republic was enacted with reference to a real or supposed temporary exigency, and without much consideration of or regard for the Constitution of the country or the real spirit and genius of our form of government. The laws for the appointment of Federal officials as supervisors of election in the several States belong to that class of legislation, and are so obnoxious to the people and subversive of free institutions that the people all over the land demand their immediate repeal. These laws make a bold direct attack upon the dearest rights of freemen. They cannot be justified or defended on any ground consistent with the perpetuity of free institutions. They strike down and would destroy the most sacred rights of the people. The very basis upon which the founders of our Government erected the grandest institutions known among men is endangered by these measures, and, if allowed to stand, the superstructure—the grand and inimitable political architecture we so much admire—will soon totter and fall.

The laws providing a test oath for jurors and expressly authorizing the presence of armed Federal soldiers at the polls, it is said, might have been repealed without resistance if democrats had consented to allow the laws authorizing the appointment of Federal supervisors of election and of deputy marshals to take control of elections to stand. Such a concession on our part would have been an inexcusable surrender of a great principle and abhorrent to the people we represent. I know that that alone would be a grand work, and it will be a bright page in our history.

For the people—peaceful, law-abiding citizens in the performance of their duties and in the enjoyment of their immunities—feel a deep-seated aversion, an irrepressible repugnance to Federal muskets at the polls. They are naturally and wisely jealous of such influences. They understand and interpret the true and unmistakable meaning, of soldiers at the voting places to be that the people cannot be trusted, and that brute force is essential to maintain order. Thhis mode of subduing men cannot be acceptable to the masses of any party. It would therefore have been gratifying to to me, and a far more hopeful sign of the times, if laws so vicious and so destructive to civil liberty could have been wiped out by common consent. They should and will be buried with the alien and sedition laws and kindred measures, all conceived in partisan bitterness and for a season sustained for mere partisan purposes. But, rest assured, the unerring judgment of the people will place over their tomb such an emphatic condemnation as will make their sleep everlasting.

And this inglorious effort on the other side of this House to rekindle the fires of sectional bitterness and feed and fan the withering, blighting, and blasting flames of discord and hatred will prove unavailing before the great mass of the people of all sections of our country, who now stand with outstretched hands imploring the good angel of peace, fraternity, mercy, and good-will to men to avert the mischief and give us once more—

> A union of waters,
> A union of lands,
> A union that none can sever;
> A union of hearts,
> A union of hands,
> Our own glorious Union forever.

These statutes under consideration are antagonistic to the cardinal doctrine of home rule, local self-government; the right of each State to enjoy in the spirit of the original Union all the rights not surrendered to the General Government. This constitutes the distinctive and vital feature of our political edifice. I know it has become the habit of the times, when any reference is made to the principle of home rule, sneeringly to meet it with the assertion that the States have no rights the Federal Government is bound to respect, and that what is wanted is a stronger government. A great centralized government, with the reins in the hands of one man—freed from the present constitutional restraints, freed from the checks and restraints of a legislative body—would, they reason, give us "peace and rest." But it would be the peace of a loathsome despotism, and the rest found in the grave of liberty.

Our country is of such vast extent, with such an infinite variety of local interests, and with such diversified wants growing out of climate, soil, productions, and habits, that the necessary and unalienated rights of the local authorities of the States must be adhered to, preserved, and cherished. The founders of our Union succeeded in overcoming the difficulties in their way, and establishing the Union consistent with local self-government in the States.

In thus solving this grand political problem, they manifested a wisdom, foresight, and statesmanship unequaled in the history of our race. What they settled I hope to see as enduring as the everlasting hills. They determined to have a national government—a union of the States—with the rights of the nation and the rights of the States based on principles consistent with the welfare and prosperity of each. By their action, the sovereignty of the several States was left unimpaired and unaffected in respect to all matters of local jurisdiction. They at the same time recognized and adopted the principle that the Federal Government was also the creature of the will of the people, and that the Federal Government should possess, exercise, and enjoy such functions as were essential for the efficient administration of the interests connected with the general welfare of the nation. Each—the States on the one hand and the Federal Government on the other—moving within the limits of this sphere assigned, and we have a system of government the best, purest, and grandest ever made by men for the people.

The inaugural address of Mr. Jefferson, delivered on the 4th of March, 1801, presents such an admirable epitome of the principles of the democratic party of that day, and for which we are now contending, that I will read a few paragraphs from it. He says the essential principles of our Government are these:

> Equal and exact justice to all men, of whatever state or persuasion, religious or political; the support of the State governments in all their rights as the most competent administration for our domestic concerns, and the surest bulwarks against anti-republican tendencies; the preservation of the General Government in its whole constitutional vigor as the sheet anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad; a jealous care of the right of election by the people; a mild and safe corrective of abuses which are lopped by the sword of revolution where peaceable remedies are unprovided; absolute acquiescence in the decisions of the majority, the vital principle of republics, from which there is no appeal but to force, the vital principle and immediate parent of despotism; the supremacy of the civil over the military authority. They should be the creed of our political faith, the text of civil instruction, the touchstone by which to try the services of those we trust, and should we wander from them in moments of error or alarm, let us hasten to retrace our steps and to regain the road which alone leads to peace, liberty, and safety.

Mr. Chairman, these principles are cardinal with the democratic party and should be, I submit, dear to every lover of popular institutions. Ever since our unfortunate civil war closed we have struggled to restore, and permanently secure, constitutional government and home rule wherever they were denied to any portion of our common country.

Under one pretense after another the principle was disregarded and trampled under foot by the party in power, and the legislation now about to be repealed forms one of the darkest pages of that history. Posterity will regard it as a disgrace to the party responsible for it. The disinfecting matter thrown over it in this dying effort to justify and perpetuate it cannot suppress the loathsome character of these laws nor the offensive manner of their execution.

I shall not stop to recount or describe the revolting scenes that have occurred in the free cities of the North in the execution of these laws. I leave that to others; I merely discuss the principle involved.

If I knew that in this beautiful city—the capital of this great nation every family were threatened with destruction by gunpowder concealed beneath each hearthstone, I would certainly give the alarm, trusting they would not wait to see the practical working of it before removing the danger. It should be enough for us to know that these laws are in principle pernicious and deadly.

This law, after providing for the appointment of an unlimited number of special deputy marshals to attend the polls under compensation at the rate of $5 per day, not exceeding ten days, by section 2022, makes the further provision which I desire to have read, and invite the earnest attention of every lawyer and representative of the people to its terms.

SEC. 2022. The marshal and his general deputies, and such special deputies, shall keep the peace, and support and protect the supervisors of election in the discharge of their duties, preserve order at such places of registration and at such polls, prevent fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting thereat, or fraudulent conduct on the part of any officer of election, and immediately, either at the place of registration or polling place, or elsewhere, and either before or after registering or voting, to arrest and take into custody, with or without process, any person who commits, or attempts or offers to commit, any of the acts or offenses prohibited herein, or who commits any offense against the laws of the United States; but no person shall be arrested without process for any offense not committed in the presence of the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, or of the supervisors of election, or either of them, and, for the purposes of arrest or the preservation of the peace, the supervisors of election shall, in the absence of the marshal's deputies, or if required to assist such deputies, have the same duties and powers as deputy marshals; nor shall any person, on the day of such election, be arrested without process for any offense committed on the day of registration.

This provision should arouse and startle the most confiding and indifferent citizen. After a careful reading of these laws I am shocked by the letter and spirit of them. It is absolutely amazing to see any intelligent man yield his assent to them unless he first deliberately resolved that our people are incapable of self-government and must at once be provided with a master. The country should be alarmed to find so many of their representatives willing to preserve and perpetuate these hateful, malignant, and destructive laws. An examination of the section read will show clearly their odious character. They show an unjust distrust of the people. There is implied a want of confidence in the honesty, integrity, and capacity of the people. The people are boldly told that they must be watched, guarded, and scrutinized as to the manner in which they enjoy their most precious immunity as citizens. This is an inexcusable insult to freemen. I regard these laws an unmitigated outrage. It is to my mind vile, wicked, partisan machinery, devised in the interests of a party now repudiated and in progress of being expelled from power by the people whose precious blood-bought rights were thus assailed.

The elective franchise is a sham, a mockery, and deceptive if surrounded by such influential and absolutely coercive appliances. If the hired minions of a party can be clothed with authority at discretion to supervise the conduct, interpret the motives, and construe the acts of a freeman as he is about to deposit his vote, and then and there, without process, arrest and imprison him, thereby robbing him of his liberty and dearest rights, then popular government in this country is a thing of the past.

By this law unlimited authority and discretion are conferred upon these Federal officials. Every citizen in the exercise of his right of suffrage is placed at the mercy of the hired minions of a party. These officials are empowered to appear at the place of voting, and, either before or after voting by a citizen, to arrest and take him into custody with or without process.

This he is authorized to do if in his judgment and discretion the citizen commits, or attempts or offers to commit, any of the acts or offenses prohibited. "Fraudulent voting" or "fraudulent conduct on the part of any officer of election" are designated as acts provided against.

Consider for a moment the mischievous and alarming power here conferred. For example, officers of election in the States, chosen by the suffrages of their fellow-citizens, in the performance of their duties must decide all questions of the elector's right to vote, and in discharging that duty their judgments and consciences lead them to accept the ballot of an elector, and forthwith the little Federal deputy marshal decides that the officers were thereby guilty of fraudulent conduct, seizes them, and removes them from the polls. Is not this utterly destructive of free elections?

Again, a freeman in the act of depositing his ballot or in approaching the polls for that purpose may be ruthlessly seized and held in confinement by one of these Federal officials without any cause, and with the simple excuse that the officer thought the citizen "had offered to commit" one of the offenses prohibited. The Federal officer is at liberty under this law to torture and misconstrue any word, act, or look of an elector, or of any officer of election, into an "offer to commit the offense." This infamous act not only confers the right to arrest a party when the Federal marshal or supervisor may think he has committed some offense prohibited, but when the official says the voter offers to commit it. They are allowed to pass judgment on the motives and intent of a party.

My colleague [Mr. MCKINLEY] in his speech on Friday last asserted in the presence of men learned in the law that these laws to be repealed are no innovation on the principles of the common law. I deny it. No such stigma rests upon that collection of laws transmitted to us through the purest channels of wisdom and love of freedom. If in my studies I had discovered such principles, my youthful ardor and stronger love of later years for the profession of my choice would have been weakened, if not entirely destroyed.

My friend palpably misconstrues this statute, and is thereby misled into a criticism of the remarks of my colleague, [Mr. HURD.]

To show the error, I quote from the speech of the gentleman, in which he says:

Great exception is made to that part of the law which authorizes the marshals to arrest without process. The impression is sought to be made that this power is exceptional and without any qualification, while an examination of the law itself shows that the power is carefully limited and guarded. My colleague [Mr. HURD] falls into this error, and would leave (unintentionally I have no doubt) a wrong impression of the law. Here is the language of the gentleman, found in his speech of April 1:

"The third objection is that these supervising officers are armed with authority unknown in the history of the common law or State laws. They have authority at the polls on the day of election to arrest, without warrant, any man whom they may suspect of being about to engage in a violation of the laws. There is no principle of common law or State law which can authorize the arrest of citizens on suspicion of an intention to commit an offense."

My friend has not read the law aright, as he will observe. Here is the language of the statute, "but no person shall be arrested without process, for any offense not committed in the presence of the marshal or his general or special deputies." Arrest without process can only be made upon view of the crime committed in the presence of the officer, not upon suspicion or idle rumor, not upon information, but upon actual view. There is nothing exceptional in this law.

The words quoted from the statute by my colleague [Mr. MCKINLEY] when thus detached from the words immediately preceding might mislead a non-professional person. The infidel by that method of detaching words tried to prove the Bible said, "There is no God," but the words immediately preceding in the same verse and connection furnished the explanation. The whole verse reads: "The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God."

Now, my colleague, [Mr. MCKINLEY,] for whom I entertain the kindliest feeling, construes the words he quotes to provide that an arrest without process can only be made upon view of the crime actually committed in the presence of the officer. To correct him let me read from the statute the words immediately preceding the words he quotes, in connection with his quotation, and the sense, force, and meaning of it is so clear that the plain, practical, common-sense men of the country can understand it and will not be misled. I read from the statute:

To arrest and take into custody, with or without process, any person who commits, or attempts or offers to commit, any of the acts or offenses prohibited herein, or who commits any offense against the laws of the United States; but no person shall be arrested without process for any offense not committed in the presence of the marshal or his general or special deputies.

Thus it will be seen, when the offense is committed elsewhere than in the officer's presence then arrest without process is unauthorized.

I invite my colleague to review his examination of this law, and as he has attempted to defend it on an erroneous construction I still hope to hear him denounce it.

If a little Federal officer, called special deputy marshal or supervisor, should at the polls decide or profess to believe that a high-minded citizen was not entitled to vote, and finding him approaching the polls, he may under this law seize him and imprison him, on the sole pretense that he was "attempting or offering" to commit the offense. What becomes of the right of the people to be secure in their persons if this law is tolerated? Has love of liberty departed from the land, and must our rights be so insecure?

If we must have a despotism, I beg of you give it some appearance of decency. If such immense power is to be delegated to some one to overawe, intimidate, and control the action of electors, give it to agents who make pretension to fairness and have some sense of honor even when acting unjustly and arbitrarily. I hate, loathe, abhor despotism in any form, but I would infinitely prefer a military force at the polls to this unlimited number of unscrupulous deputy marshals. A monarch would afford better protection to person and property than these thousands of petty, corrupt, irresponsible officials. Great power invested in petty, irresponsible officials is the most alarming.

Then, Mr. Chairman, all danger of fraud at elections can be provided against without establishing a centralized despotism. All over this country the people are divided into political parties, with partisan zeal and vigilance always sufficient to guarantee an untiring watchfulness at the polls to detect frauds, expose every infraction of the election laws, and bring offenders to punishment. This is not offensive to electors, and secures the highest degree of fairness practicable. It is then a contest of citizen with citizen, on equal footing, with equal rights, each prompted by pure, honest, patriotic motives, struggling for the triumph of what each believes to be right.

When our political contests, inseparable from popular government, are thus conducted, it may even be with great zeal and a high degree of partisan feeling, even bordering upon bitterness; but when the result is known all render a cheerful submission to the voice of a majority. This feature of the practical working of our system of government has commanded the admiration of the civilized world. As we have from time to time passed through the fiery ordeal of political controversies and settled our differences at the polls, yielding peaceful obedience to majorities and moving forward with the most extraordinary growth in all the elements which constitute the real greatness and glory of a nation, who has not felt proud of his country and had his heart swell with emotions of gratitude for the blessed achievements of our ancestors in behalf of freedom. Let us, then, enjoy and perpetuate this beneficent form of government.

These laws to be repealed affect most directly and materially the Northern States. This does not change the principle, but should awaken and "fire up" the northern heart to the dangers now brought home to our own doors. Another illustration is here furnished of the unchangeable law that you cannot by legislation do injustice to another, either individual, a party, or section of country, without sooner or later feeling the evil influences reacting and returning to vex and torment their authors. History is full of illustrations and warnings on this subject from the time Haman erected a gallows on which to hang good old Mordecai and got hung himself down to the present hour. In my youth this unalterable law of God was taught me by a good man repeating these lines:

He digged a pit, he digged it deep,
He digged it for a brother,
But the pit he digged he himself fell in,
The pit he digged for another.

We have been told that the President would veto our action, as if that should settle the question in advance. This is in keeping with the past history of that organization. With the republican party the Executive is at one time the Government, then again Congress, and then in turn the judicial department. But they should learn that in a free government such infractions of the constitution are not only criminal, but impolitic.

Our form of government has wisely conferred upon the three departments, executive, legislative, and judicial, distinct rights, duties, and prerogatives. They must each move and keep within the orbit prescribed or the entire system is endangered. Under this system of government these different departments may not at all times be in entire accord on questions of policy. What is to be the result? Must the immediate representatives of the people, fresh from their homes, familiar with the pressing wants, interests, and hopes of the people, surrender their convictions in obedience to the partisan necessities and greed of the minority or the views of policy that the Executive may be supposed to entertain? Must the legislative department in advance consult the will of the Executive and conform its action to his wishes? I trust not. We are here representing freemen, and whatever fate awaits us in the future, for myself I enter an earnest, heartfelt protest against this attempt to intimidate and coerce the legislative department. We are not required to anticipate the views or action of the Executive on these questions nor to assail his title to the exalted position he is allowed to fill. Our record on the question of that title—if I may be allowed the digression—has been made and has passed into history.

On the 3d day of March, 1877, the next day after the completion of the electoral count—of eight outvoting seven—a resolution passed this House by an affirmative vote of 146 democrats, and no democrat voting against it, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the duty of the House to declare, and this House does hereby solemnly declare, that Samuel J. Tilden, of the State of New York, received 196 electoral votes for the office of President of the United States, and that Samuel J. Tilden, having received the votes of a majority of the electors appointed as aforesaid, he was thereby duly elected President of the United States of America for the term of four years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1877.

This was followed by a resolution declaring the title of Mr. Hayes unassailable on the ground of the decision of the electoral commission. A party may be deprived of his home by the unjust judgment of a court in gross violation of the plainest principles of justice and law, and yet the title thus secured, it may even be by vicious, wicked means, remain secure from assault. Thus we must for the present acquiesce in that decision, but we cannot forget or forgive the great wrongs by means of which Mr. Hayes holds his seat. We have, therefore, as American citizens sworn upon our country's altar never, never to cease our efforts or lay down our peaceful, lawful, and constitutional weapons of warfare until the frauds and crimes committed to secure that high office for the present incumbent are condemned by a free election, and the choice of the people inaugurated and firmly seated in the presidential chair. To this end these instruments of fraud now under our control must be destroyed. This cunningly devised machinery that may be used to thwart the will of the people must be annihilated. These chains, forged to enslave us, are in our possession, and we would be untrue to ourselves, recreant to the great trust committed to us, and unfaithful to our children, if we failed to break them to pieces and grind them into dust.

Again, Mr. Chairman, we have heard it proclaimed on the other side of this Chamber, over and over, by my distinguished colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] and others, and the key-note thus sounded has been echoed back by a portion of the partisan press of the country, that this proposed repeal of certain laws is "revolutionary;" that by these measures we will starve the Government and it will die. Now, is this a serious apprehension, or is it mere declamation for political effect? Laws with us are not unalterable. To seek and accomplish a modification or repeal of an existing law is often the result of the second sober thought of the people, exhibiting the highest degree of wisdom and patriotism. What, then, confers upon the republican party the right to enact laws, and, when a repeal is attempted, boldly and defiantly to charge the act as disloyal and treasonable. Upon what meat doth these our Cæsars feed that they have grown so strong? "Though you speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, you become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal." The gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE,] in his speech on Saturday last, claimed for his party the charity "that suffereth long," but did not claim the charity spoken of in the balance of the verse, "a charity that vaunteth not itself, and is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly, and rejoiceth not in iniquity."

It is not pretended that it would be revolutionary to make the appropriations provided for, or separately to introduce and pass the repealing measures included in this bill. But it is urged that this course threatens coercion of the Executive, and is therefore revolutionary. Is that the just or necessary inference? If so, then in numerous instances the republican party attempted to coerce the Executive and has thereby made a fearful record of its disloyalty. These very laws to be repealed were brought into being in that treasonable manner.

But we cannot know in advance the will of the Executive in reference to these measures. If we could be so devoid of the dignity and manhood becoming the representatives of the people as to seek it all the past history of the delicate and responsible duties incumbent upon the Chief Magistrate admonishes us that we would fail. He may be now impatiently waiting to gratify the people by a prompt and cheerful approval of them, but we cannot know it. It is certainly premature to conjecture the action of the President and imagine consequences that may follow, and from this vehemently and frantically charge the dominant party in Congress with the high crime of "an assault upon the life of the Republic."

Now, sir, this charge hardly merited the serious, earnest, and triumphant answers given it on this floor. When I heard the charge of a revolutionary purpose made it seemed to me, from my knowledge of the motives, aspirations, and hopes of my colleagues on this side of the Chamber, to be in keeping with the feelings of the tender-hearted maiden who was sobbing and crying hysterically, when her mother inquired the cause, and she said she had been thinking she might in a few years marry, and then in the course of time be blessed with a beautiful child, and then it might wander off into the woods and starve to death, and that it was nearly breaking her heart.

This claim that we are about to starve the Government and it will die informs me for the first time that the Executive, or members of Congress, or members of the judiciary constitute the Government. Every member of Congress might commit suicide, which is not supposable; the President might abandon the White House and flee to parts unknown forever, a still more improbable thing; and every member of the judicial department might leave the country in disgust at republican legislation, altogether the most probable thing, and still the Government would live.

The life of this great nation—of the Government of this country—does not depend upon what the members of these departments may eat, drink, or wear. Its existence is not contingent upon the payment of the President's salary or my salary. We are not the Government. The Constitution of the country, the great organic, cardinal, and fundamental principles upon which our system of government rests, constitute the Government.

Our national life—the vital breath upon which our national existence depends—is the principle involved in this contest, the purity of the ballot-box, and freedom of elections. That precious right is here assailed, and when individuals or a party threaten to destroy it, we say we will not feed you or vote you money of the people while you are doing it. This is our mode of self-defense. We firmly believe the Government cannot live unless we so defend it.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I must say I have an abiding, unwavering faith in the capacity of the people for self-government; faith in the ultimate triumph of truth; faith in the permanency of the principles for which we now contend; faith in the triumph of constitutional liberty, and above all faith in the God of our fathers, and shall firmly and unflinchingly cling to the principles of civil government introduced by the statesmen of the Revolution. Following in their footsteps, I feel there is safety.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Chairman, after the long and exhaustive arguments which have been devoted to these questions by the leading gentlemen upon both sides of this Chamber, I do not flatter myself that anything I may say will throw any additional light upon the subject. But being the Representative and mouth-piece of a district in the State of Kentucky which feels the deepest interest in the repeal of the statutes now under consideration, I deem it my duty, in reflecting their sentiment upon this floor, to unite my voice, feeble as it may be, with that of gentlemen who have preceded me in calling a halt upon the policy of this Government which has trampled beneath its feet for nearly seventeen years the right of the States to control their own elections in their own way. I join with other gentlemen on this side in advocating the restoration to the States of the right to manage and control all elections within their own bounds according to the laws enacted by themselves.

These are great questions, Mr. Chairman, and I think it but right that the consideration and discussion of them should be continued until this House is satisfied; for the more they are discussed the more certain it will be that even gentlemen upon the other side who now stand firm against the repeal of these statutes, when left to themselves, and when the passions of the hour die within them, will come forward, as men and patriots, and stand upon the same platform on which the democratic party stands—that there shall be in this land, henceforth and forever, free elections, untrammeled by either the civil or military power of the Government, and untainted by fraud on the part of its officers.

These questions which we are called upon to decide are fraught with more of evil or of good to future generations than any that Congress has been called upon to decide since the adoption of our Constitution. When that instrument was adopted no man who voted for it in the convention, or who framed any provision that is a part of it, dreamed for a moment that the power granted to the Federal Government to make or alter the regulations of the States with reference to the election of Senators or Representatives would be prostituted in the manner in which it has been. The democratic party intend to go on with this conflict until each and all of these statutes are repealed. They have renewed it here and now, in the interest of the people, in the interest of the Constitution, in the interest of liberty, and in the interest of the sacred rights of the States.

I hold, Mr. Chairman, that within the limits of the Constitution there can be found no warrant for the usurped authority that has been exercised by the Federal Government to control the election of Representatives by the States under the cover of enactment by virtue of that clause in the Constitution which authorizes it to make or alter such regulations as the States may make in regard to their election. I submit that the Federal Government, under the Constitution, can never hold an election of any kind. Such a thing as a United States election is unknown to that instrument; it contains no provisions for holding such an election. Can there be a United States election without a United States voter? Can you hold an election without electors? And if there are no United States voters, (which has been held and decided by the highest courts of this land interpreting the Constitution for us,) shall we provide ways and means whereby the Federal Government shall interfere with the rights of the voters of the States—by bulldozing and intimidation, driving away from the polls those whom the States, acting within their constitutional authority, have authorized to approach and register their will undismayed and unintimidated by any interference upon the part of the Federal Government or any foreign power.

Will any gentleman on this floor claim that there is any such thing as a United States voter in this land? Will any man in this House claim that the Federal Government has ever conferred upon any individual the right to vote? Not one. Gentlemen on the other side, who have stood here defending these laws, have not ventured to take the ground that there are any citizens who are made voters under the laws or by the Constitution of the United States.

The fifteenth amendment of the Constitution, which is the only provision having any relation to the right of suffrage, confers that right upon no one; it simply limits the right of the States to disfranchise any man on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. The fifteenth amendment provides no more than this—that no State of this Union which theretofore had the right to fix the qualifications of electors should disqualify any citizen as a voter upon the ground simply that he was of African descent. That is all the amendment means or says.

Then, Mr. Chairman, if the United States Government has no voters or electors, in the name of common sense what right has this Government to go into the States and seize upon the electors or voters of a State when they are exercising their rights under the constitution and laws of the State? I know that Congress has the right to make regulations on this subject, or to alter regulations which the States may have made, and when it does make or alter such regulations I know that it is incumbent upon the States to send Representatives here in accordance with the regulations that Congress has made. That being so, gentlemen on the other side who address themselves to this subject ask, "Cannot the Government control this matter? Is not power given in the Constitution to the General Government to enforce these regulations? Do gentlemen upon the democratic side claim that Congress is to enact a law which it has no power to enforce?" I answer no, gentlemen; far from it. The Government has the power to enforce these regulations; this power is given by the Constitution itself. In what form is it given? In the provision that—

> Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

If any State dares to send here men not elected according to the requirements of the laws of Congress in regard to the time, place, and manner of holding elections, then Congress must refuse seats to such men, and the State must go unrepresented in these halls. That is the only means this Government has of enforcing such regulations as may be enacted.

This is just and fair, if there be any such thing as State sovereignty. What do you mean by sovereignty? What is the difference in this respect between the States and the Federal Government? The Federal Constitution and the State constitutions limit to a certain extent the power of the States. But for these limitations the States would be sovereign in the fullest sense of the term, possessing full power to do whatever they chose, without restrictions of any character whatever.

When we look at the Federal Government we find that it is by the very terms of its creation a government restricted in its powers. The Constitution is the charter and law of its being. Every right which it is to exercise must be found there, given either expressly or by necessary implication as an incident in carrying out some expressed grant.

They stand upon different footings: the one the possessor of all power that is not expressly denied to it; that is a sovereign indeed; and the other the possessor of only such power as the charter grants to it, which, as I have said, is that which gives to it life and is the law of its being and existence. Therefore, when you come to investigate these matters you will find there is in this land and in this country such a thing as the sovereign power of a State, which sovereign power has a right to control all matters of election within its limits. The Federal Government has no more right to invade the precincts of a State in the case of a congressional election than it has in any other State election.

Do any gentlemen upon the other side of this House pretend that if a State refuses to act, as some of these gentlemen have put it, Congress can pass a law and send supervisors of election and Federal marshals there to hold their own election, and send men into the halls of Congress without the aid of the State? Not one pretends to say that. You know that unless a Representative comes direct from the State, clothed with the authority of the State, with the votes counted, and his certificate of election given to him by the governor of the State, he has no right of entrance into these halls though he may have all the certificates that all the supervisors and marshals of this land could give him thrust into his pocket.

Then if this election is a State election, what right has the Government to interfere in it? None whatever; none at all. How far can it interfere? It only furnishes the regulations by which the election is held by the State. It can take no part in the election whatever. The Government furnishes the rule and the State goes by it. The Government can go no further than the Constitution authorizes, and that is "to make or alter such rules." Its duty and power ceases there. After the election it can go so far as in the Hall of this House when the Representative comes to present his credentials, to see that his election and qualifications and the returns are in accordance with the laws of Congress and the Constitution of the country. But the gentleman says: "Suppose the State refuses to act, what then? Suppose some State says it will not send to the halls of Congress a Representative, then if a majority of them so act, why Congress must die and the Government be dissolved." That may be true, gentlemen, if enough of the States of this Government were deliberately to determine they would send no longer their Representatives to Congress. Whenever this shall take place, whenever this Government falls so low in the estimation of a majority of the States of this Union, whenever it becomes so contemptible, degraded, or tyrannical that a majority of the States shall deliberately determine in their wisdom that they will no longer send to this House their Representatives, it is better that this Government should die, and that the people should institute another against which they have no prejudices, and which will not perpetrate upon them those wrongs which have brought into hate and contempt the Government with which they refuse to affiliate and support.

I say there can come no wrong to the Government from a source of that kind. No State will refuse to send here her Representatives. Why? Because if she fails to send her Representatives here she has to bear taxation without representation in the halls of Congress. She cannot escape from the payment of her dues, although she receives no benefit from those assessments. And if some State were to determine even for the time being not to send Representatives, the time would come when the patriotism of the State and of its people would assert itself and their Representatives would be returned to the halls of Congress. Non-action or failure to elect Representatives by a majority of the States might produce death, but no republic can by its constitution provide against non-action at some time on the part of the many branches into which the various powers are distributed. There is no remedy consistent with its form; there is none except a centralization of all power into the hands of one person; then there is no room for dispute, and non-action cannot occur.

Neither is there room for liberty. Our forefathers wisely preferred a republic, however evanescent, with its powers distributed, to absolutism perpetual. They preferred to rely upon a love of liberty and patriotism to protect the Government from death by non-action. When in the history of this world did any republic ever die from non-action? Point to it. Not one. But the shores of time are strewn with the wrecks of those who have been broken by the storms, passions, and the ruder shocks of brute force. Brute force is military power. Brute force is soldiers at the polls. Brute force is hired bullies and paid spies, called here supervisors and deputy marshals, by which those in power perpetuate and increase it. It is the same police and gendarmerie relied upon by the Bonapartes and other tyrants of the world, when in the name of law and order, ay, even liberty, they surrounded the polls to keep the peace and prevent fraud, and under surveillance like this the people were said to have established a strong government to protect them from fraud and to keep the peace at the polls. After that the Emperor never troubled them with other elections except when he wanted his power increased or confirmed.

The theory of our whole system oppose any interference even by the State, much less the General Government, in the polling precincts on the day of election. Our Government is founded upon a thorough conviction that the people are capable in the States of taking care of their State affairs, in the county of their county affairs, in each voting precinct of theirs. Thus is each local community made independent and trusted to take care of its own affairs. The law presumes there is enough interest, enough honesty, enough sense at each poll to see there is a free election and a fair count; that each party will watch the other, and interest will protect and defend against opposing interest, ambition against ambition, just as it is in the highest branches of the Government. Mere laws in the Constitution or upon paper are idle barriers to ambition or wrong. There must be opposing influences to restrain. If local influences fail to secure a fair election, then the theory of our Government is a failure and the experiment will sooner or later end in disaster. Paid bullies and hired spies under the control of distant power cannot do good, but will themselves become the source of frauds and oppression not dreamed of before. These laws not only lay down the gap by which all manner of frauds and evils may enter, but themselves violate those provisions of the Constitution which enable the States to fix the qualifications of the voters. The qualifications of the voters in some States are dependent upon registration, and the States alone can fix their qualifications. Yet we find in these laws, sections 820–821, sought to be repealed, wholesale provisions for United States supervisors and marshals over the registration lists which are made for the use of the State and under its own authority, whereby such registration lists are virtually annulled and set aside. They may challenge any one who presents himself for registration. They may inspect the list and mark any name for challenge. They put their names upon State records without authority of the State, and all this long before the election is held. No stretch of the words "manner of holding the election" can be made to cover this arbitrary and tyrannical assumption of power on the part of the Federal Government over the registration lists of the States, which are the records of the qualifications of the voters. This power is expressly given to the States and denied to Congress by the Federal Constitution.

These laws go even further than this. They make the supervisors and marshals peace officers, and direct them to keep the peace at the polls. Keep whose peace? Not the Federal Government, for it has no peace except upon the high seas, in this District, and such territory as has been ceded to it by other States, and in the Territories. To keep the peace of the State! Can the Government keep the peace of the State at the polls? What provision of the Constitution gives this extraordinary power? Nowhere; no man will claim it. The peace may be broken at the polls without in any way affecting the election. What amounts to a breach of the peace often puzzles the brain of astute judges. If two drunken men get into a row the peace is broken and they must be arrested by United States marshals, and in my district it is well known what this means. It means, guilty or not guilty, confinement in jail, separation from family, transportation to a distant part of the State, robbery of what little the poor fellow has, and finally a return, half naked, starved, and half dead, to where he once had a shelter and family and home to find all sacrificed in a vain effort to protect him from unjust persecutions at the hands of United States marshals. A man who if guilty before any magistrate would pay a small fine for an election spree must be arrested and bail taken after being carried before some commissioner who may live fifty miles away, confined until bailed in a loathsome jail, all at the caprice of some irresponsible deputy marshal. The United States Government has no more to do with the peace at the polls in Kentucky than the Czar of Russia, unless in case of invasion or insurrection when called upon by the State authorities under the circumstances prescribed in the Constitution. If the congressional elections were broken up by force there is no United States statute to punish the criminal, because it is no offense against the Government, but against the sovereign power of the State.

For over three-fourths of a century in the history of this Government no such laws were dreamed of, no one ever thought about the General Government entering a protectorate over the State from the frauds of its own citizens, or placing its hired bullies around the ballot-box, with unlimited and irresponsible power of arrest over the voters. Whence came these laws which are a satire upon self-government? And if there exists such a necessity as to render it imperative to retain them, destroy the hopes of man in the ultimate success of this probably the last grand experiment under fortuitous circumstances of self-government by man. Upon what foundation are they based, where is the prototype upon which they were modeled? Did our republican friends go to the teachings of the fathers, to the Constitution of the country, to any of the grand old Commonwealths who, never overrun by invading foes, still feel the pride of their ancestry? No. The laws on which these were modeled were exhaled from the miasmas of the swamps which around the Crescent City breed and generate noxious poisons and disease, and which, like the yellow fever, are conveyed to the systems of those with whom they are brought into contact by ties of commerce or association. The rottenness, degradation, and infamy of carpet-bag rule in Louisiana brought forth the leprous offspring which was adopted by its paternal sire, the great republican party, and invested with power to control the elections in this country against the will of the people, in order that they might gratify their unholy lust for place, plunder, and power. The disfranchisement of the majority of the respectable people made their enactment possible. They provided the ways and means for a continual reproduction of the same result. Registrations, supervisors, and marshals were then for the first time used as machinery to thwart the expressed will of the people, to renew the lease of power in the interest of those who appointed them. The means were so apt, covered by a pretense so laudable and in their operation so certain that the great leaders at Washington, with the foresight worthy of a better cause, determined to provide against the fall of their own dynasty by similar means. The use of United States marshals and deputy marshals under the enforcement act satisfied these wise political rascals that a modified law would serve their purpose, and they determined to put under the surveillance of their own party the election of Congressmen in every State in this Union, so far as was necessary to secure a continuation of their power.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what necessity exists for these laws? As my time is limited I will not stop to consider the subject of the Army provisions which have been so long and elaborately talked about by the various gentlemen who have taken part in this debate. It is not worth while now to spend time upon that. The very gentlemen upon the other side of the House who have so ably argued that question admit—the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] himself the leader of the party on the other side and the only gentleman who has presented a plausible statement of their case before the country, was himself forced to admit that the measure was just and right, and if presented as an independent measure he would vote for it himself. He was opposed to its enactment; he is opposed to the continuation of it. Even the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] came to the House with a proposition the other day, offered to the democratic party, that he would agree to the repealing of this clause, but he objected to the enforcement of these penalties on those who violated the law. He wished the clause simply stricken from the statute. Now, we intend not only to repeal the power to place soldiers at the polls; we intend to impose a penalty on the man who dares to put them there that will forever prevent the recurrence of the sights we have witnessed in this country. Men say here that soldiers have not been illegally used at the polls. Did not my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] read from the history of that State instances when, time and again, they had been used there? I do not refer merely to the scenes which were witnessed in that State just at the close of the war; for I know the license which war gives to override the law. But, sir, when peace reigns in the land as it does now, when the storms and passions of the war have gone by, and we are still called to witness gross outrages occurring under the cover of this law, I ask is it not proper and right we should repeal those laws which authorized those unjust acts to be committed, especially when there is no such thing now as insurrection or rebellion? Ought we not to take away the power from any man to ever again trample on the rights of voters at the polls?

Now you have seen States laid low with Federal invasion. Why, not two years ago—yes, a little longer than that—you recollect that in 1876 what a wail went all over the country from the little State of South Carolina, when her representatives, elected by her sovereign people, went to the halls of legislation and were met by a corporal's guard under the command of a rough, uneducated, brutal corporal, who was as ignorant as he was imperious, and backed by soldiers who obeyed his orders without questioning his power or authority, and those men who were elected by the people were turned away from the halls of legislation and were not permitted to enter. If you want to prevent a recurrence of similar scenes we must put our condemnation upon the illegal use of power, we must take from these men who upon occasions of this kind, urged on by passions, illegally use the soldiers; we must deprive them of the power of thus illegally using them. Shall we not do it now, when the voice of discord has ceased, when the passions of war have ceased, when every soldier has gone to his proper place on the frontier or on the Rio Grande? Is it not just and fair, is it not right and proper, to enter on the statute-books of the country our objection, without regard to party, our universal condemnation of the use of soldiers either at the polls or in the state-houses of the various States, either to regulate legislation or to control elections?

Now, furthermore, the military power is not the worst oppression in this matter. As I have shown, I hope, in the short time that I have had, the illegal use made of the military and how the Constitution has forbidden and prohibits the Federal Government from interfering in any measure with voters at the polls, may I not show how the marshals and supervisors are illegally used? Will gentlemen say now that this power is not capable of being greatly abused, and will we suffer an unconstitutional statute which is capable of accomplishing and does do more evil than good to remain on the statute-book; which authorizes the Federal Government to interfere at the polls by virtue of the civil power when we are willing to strike out and take away the military authority? Is it more degrading to a freeman to be driven from the polls at the point of the bayonet than by a United States deputy marshal? Is it less an invasion of his sovereignty under the rights guaranteed to him by the constitution of his State to allow the power of the Federal Government to interfere in one way with his right to vote than it is in another?

These outrages have been occurring all over the country. You need not go to New York in 1876 as the only time and place at which outrages have occurred, but farther back than that. I want to read to you a report made seven or eight years ago upon this subject of United States marshals and upon their use at the polls by a republican Senate committee to a republican Senate. Here is what they say about it:

> In the First and Third wards of the city of Little Rock the enforcement act and the United States marshals seem to have been employed in attempting to break up the legal polls after they were organized; while in the townships of Ashley, Badgett, and Campbell it and the United States marshals were used to vote 176 more votes in said township than there are votes in them.

This was at the commencement of the employment of these United States marshals at the polls, and there was a report made to a republican Senate, by republican members of the Senate, that the United States marshals were thus used and united in the commission of the most infamous frauds ever perpetrated upon a free people.

That is not all they say; they say further:

> The heart grows sick and our confidence in the integrity of mankind sickens and grows less day by day as we probe the acts of corruption perpetrated in this country at the late election. Our sympathies are with the cause under whose banner these unblushing and bare-faced frauds were committed, but we feel republicanism cannot prosper, nor does it deserve to prosper by the use of means employed in Pulaski County, Arkansas.

This, gentlemen, is the earliest report upon the acts of United States marshals at the polls. If they broke up the legal polls then will not they do it now? If they perpetrated frauds so black as to render sick at heart their own political friends and make them lose confidence in mankind and ashamed of their own party, will they not do so again? If they voted one hundred and seventy-six more votes in the precincts of Archer, &c., than there were votes there altogether, will they not do it again? Will you continue them in power for such a purpose or to give them such opportunities for fraud and crime? Now turn to New York in 1876, and then Davenport, as shown by the testimony taken before a committee of Congress, issued on the night before the election thirty-two hundred warrants of arrest for foreign-born citizens, not for any crime they had committed, but to prevent them from voting under their naturalization papers obtained in 1868. They had used them every year from that time on, eight years in all. They had complied as far as they were able with every provision of the law. They not only had a right to vote, but were as conscientious in it as in any pure act of their lives. A test case had been tried before Judge Blatchford, a Federal judge of great distinction, in New York, and another before Judge Freedman, a State judge, and they each held that the papers were all right. Yet this supervisor instructed his deputy marshals to ignore these decisions and arrest all these thirty-two hundred men who offered to vote the democratic ticket, for those who would vote republican were not touched. On the contrary, all arrested who would agree to vote as they wanted him were discharged immediately. Under this wholesale order six hundred and sixty were arrested and dragged to jail deprived of the privilege of voting and shut up in a pen, worse than the "black hole at Calcutta," and kept in confinement until after the election was over and then turned loose without a trial. In fact, many of them had not voted and were guilty of the great offense of "wanting" to vote. Ten thousand foreign-born citizens were intimidated and driven from the polls on that day. Many who called upon Davenport in obedience to his imperial orders before the election had their papers taken from them by this supervisor and retained by him until now, as he exhibited some of them to the committee. You can tell how great this outrage was when you know that forty thousand foreigners were naturalized in 1868 in New York City, and Davenport by his act undertook to disfranchise all but six of this mighty number.

This is the way supervisors prevent fraud and protect the ballot. These outrages ought to be sufficient of themselves to repeal the law. There was a time when a party known as the "know-nothing" party waged an unjust war upon the foreign population and the people arose in their wrath and might and swept the party from existence. There was a time when a wrong perpetrated upon a single foreign-born citizen, however humble, would wake a thrill of passion in the breast of every American. Responsive to its call, we have extended our sympathy freely to them struggling in every land for liberty and reform. The names of Sobieski, Kosciusko, and Kossuth are as familiar to us here as household words, because they were martyrs in sufferings for the cause of liberty and freedom of mankind, and will we, who shed our tears so freely over these poor foreigners when oppressed by tyranny at home, turn from them without sympathy when their sacred rights which we have given them are ruthlessly violated by a petty tyrant here? Will we suffer the law to remain which enables such wrongs to be perpetrated?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McKENZIE. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague be allowed to conclude his remarks.

Mr. BAYNE. How long does the gentleman want?

Mr. THOMPSON. I will stop in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to the extension of the time of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. THOMPSON. I will finish what I have to say upon the line of thought upon which I have been dwelling, then I will conclude.

Mr. Chairman, while upon this subject if you turn to the elections in New York in 1872 you will find that the cost of the presence of these agents on this occasion at the polls, as reported by the Caulfield committee, amounted to $120,000 in a single city; all used to pay the expense of the supervisors and marshals at a single election. You will find that in 1876, when Samuel J. Tilden was a candidate for the Presidency, in order to control the vote of that great city and State, they spent over $150,000 within the State for the purpose of hiring marshals, and they did hire five thousand men to stand around the polls and influence the election. That was nearly $30 to each man. What was the object of it? What was the purpose sought to be accomplished by it? However just the law may be, there was but one purpose that could have been had in view, and that was the purpose of corruption. It must be for the fraudulent purpose of buying votes, or using influences that ought not to be tolerated, or placing around the polls armed men to intimidate and drive away those legally qualified to vote.

Now, have we any use for this? Recollect that in Philadelphia these same scenes were repeated. A few weeks ago the Wallace committee took testimony upon that subject and United States Marshal Kerns was called to the witness-stand and testified upon this subject. I will read a short extract from that testimony. After he had testified that $50,000 of the people's money had been spent there for the employment of men to stand around the polls, Mr. HOAR asked him a question, to which the marshal replied:

> I believe the election would have been peaceable and safe from fraud without the deputy marshals. The city can do very well without the law for the appointment of supervisors and deputies; the local authorities can protect the polls.
> Question. Do you think the police amply sufficient to keep peace on election day?
> Answer. I think so, sir.

That is the statement of a republican official, of a man who administered this law in Philadelphia at the last election at an expense to the people of $50,000. He says that there were seven republican officers under the State, including the police of the city, that were already at each poll, and that they were amply sufficient to keep the peace on election day. This testimony, taken by the Senate committee, shows that the very deputy marshals were selected from the lowest and most degraded men. Murderers and drunkards were the men in whose hands this power was placed.

Can we in these hard times afford, even putting it simply on the grounds of economy, to spend $50,000 in Philadelphia, $150,000 in New York, and in proportion in all the cities of the Union having more than twenty thousand inhabitants? In 1876 the expenses aggregated about $285,000, in 1878 a little less. Thus is $500,000 of the hard-earned money wrung by taxation of the highest and most oppressive and unjust character turned to illegal purposes of corruption and intimidation at the polls of the States by the Federal Government. There are about forty cities in which the marshals can be placed, which, at $50,000 each, would make $2,000,000 expended out of the public Treasury to control the election of Congressmen. This is a large sum, but there is no reason why two, three, four, or five millions cannot be used in the same way. Every republican and every man in the city capable of being corrupted by $50 can be employed, and must be paid, if so employed, out of the public Treasury for ten days at $5 per day. Add to this the fact that all of them would be peace officers, and you may well wonder what our republican friends want with soldiers at the polls when they have a hireling force like this to rely on. With unlimited corruption funds provided from the public Treasury by these laws, and swelled with assessments on its officers, with the military to use when the necessity arises, the voice of the people can be and will be forever stifled and unheard. No wonder their elections for President are annulled and set aside.

I see that my time is about to expire. There are many other things I would like to have said upon this subject, but must forbear. I have one matter to which I would like to refer, a comparative table of the number of marshals, supervisors, and expenses. I will ask leave to append it to my remarks.

I thank the House for the attention they have given me and for the extension of my limited time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] is entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. BAYNE. I ask unanimous consent that the time for taking the recess this afternoon be extended from half past four o'clock until five minutes past five, an hour from this time. The reason why I make this request is that the hour to which I am entitled is to be divided between three gentlemen, each having twenty minutes. They desire to speak this afternoon. One is unwell and it does not suit him to come here to-night, and the other does not desire to speak to-night. I ask that the recess to-day be taken at five minutes past five o'clock.

Mr. STEPHENS. I hope there will be no objection to that.

Mr. THOMAS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] has kindly agreed to yield me twenty minutes of his time. I do not feel able to speak this afternoon. I would ask that the time which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has agreed to yield to me I may be allowed to occupy at some other time when I am able to speak. If no such time can be given me, then I will ask leave to print my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The House has ordered that a recess be taken this afternoon at half past four o'clock. It is not in the power of the Committee of the Whole to change an order made by the House.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The motion to reconsider that order was not laid upon the table. It was left so that it could be changed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HUMPHREY] fails to understand the difficulty. It requires the action of the House to set aside an order made by the House.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] desires it, the Chair will accept his suggestion as a motion that the committee rise for a moment, with a view to modify the order which has been made by the House.

Mr. STEPHENS. Let the committee rise and let the House change the order.

Mr. BUCKNER. The House is now very thin. There should be a fuller attendance before an order of the House is changed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not hear any objection to the request when made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BAYNE.] It is merely a formal motion in order to obtain the consent of the House.

Mr. STEPHENS. I ask consent that the order of the House directing that a recess be taken this afternoon at half past four o'clock be so modified that for to-day the recess shall commence at ten minutes past five o'clock.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. FORT. Allow me to suggest that when the recess is taken it be until ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that perhaps there are some speeches arranged for this evening.

Mr. FORT. My proposition is that when the recess is taken this evening it be until ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. STEPHENS. I would not object to that.

The SPEAKER. That can be done to-night.

Mr. ELAM. I do not think it would be competent for the House to-night, when probably there will not be more than ten or fifteen members present, to change any order of the House.

The SPEAKER. The proposition is that the recess be taken from to-night until to-morrow at ten o'clock. That is a matter that can be determined by the House to-night.

Mr. FORT. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committe of the Whole on the state of the Union, to proceed with the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, there are three conspicuous objections to the bill under consideration, either one of which should defeat its passage.

The first is that it is framed to coerce the President to join the Senate and House in repealing or modifying the United States election laws under penalty of refusing the Government necessary supplies, and is therefore usurpation on the part of the majority in the Senate and House.

The second is that the repealing and modifying the United States election laws as proposed in the bill is supported on the ground that the Government of the United States has not the constitutional right to supervise and regulate elections of members of Congress unless the States are in default in providing suitable election laws, and would thereby put a dangerous if not fatal interpretation on the Constitution.

The third is, that the bill proposes the repeal of certain sections of the Revised Statutes and destroys the efficacy of the others by amendments, whose existence and enforcement are indispensable to fair and pure elections in many sections of the country.

I shall take these propositions up in their order, and endeavor to sustain them.

The distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HURD,] in his speech of April 2, said:

> It is objected to these measures of legislation which we propose that there is a possibility by our passing these laws of restraining the veto power of the President; or, as my distinguished friend from Ohio put it the other day, of "interfering with his participation in the legislation." I deny that the President of the United States has any right to participate in the legislation of this country.

And the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPARKS,] who had the Army bill in charge, said:

> I deny, therefore, that the President has any legislative power.

I quote these gentlemen because they are recognized leaders of their party, because their utterances were applauded to the echo by their party friends, and because they pointedly and succinctly deny that the President has legislative power.

Now, sir, although the Constitution says that "all legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives," the limitation expressed is but apparent. In point of fact, the President has legislative power. Let us examine this question in the light of existing conditions. What is this I hold in my hand and which is under consideration? Why, a bill. It was a bill when it was first introduced. It will be but a bill after we shall have passed it. It will be but a bill after the Senate shall have passed it. What will make it a law? The President's approval, either directly by affixing his signature to it or indirectly or tacitly by retaining it for ten days. It is this approval, therefore, express or tacit, which transforms what is merely a bill, with certain attributes, into a law. What gentleman will say in the face of these facts that the President has not legislative power? It is his act, dictated by the same considerations presumptively that influence the action of this body and the action of the Senate in passing the bill, which makes the bill a law. The motives which influence him to approve the bill and those which influence us to pass it are identical. And his participation is just as essential, pro tanto, as that of this House or the Senate. Well, sir, if the President has legislative power, what is its extent? Is it so insignificant that it may be overborne at the pleasure of Congress without shock to constitutional equilibrium of powers, or is it so substantial as to render its assertion and preservation essential to the full and free exercise of the functions of government?

The answer to this question will be best presented by the closest possible analysis of the legislative power of the Government. At the risk, perhaps, of some criticism and possibly at the risk of correction, I shall undertake to show that the legislative power of the Government is susceptible of an accurate mathematical subdivision.

Since Professor Jevons has formulated algebraically politico-economic problems and converted many of them, as I think, into theorems, I may be pardoned the less pretentious effort to subdivide this legislative power into arithmetical proportions. The Constitution limits and enumerates the powers conferred on the different departments of the Government. Either by expression or necessary implication all the powers possessed by the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the Government are defined. These powers are qualitatively and quantitatively separable, and the quantity and quality of power possessed by the legislative part of the Government as well as by the others are ascertained and prescribed definitely by the Constitution. Now, to legislate is to make a law. Who can make a law? The House of Representatives cannot do it; nor can the Senate; nor can both, unless the intervention of the President has brought into existence a certain condition of things. The House, the Senate, and the President, however, can make a law. The three concurring in the formal approval of a bill makes it a law. That, without qualification, would place one-third of the legislative power in each. But the Constitution says:

> Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it become a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his objections to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such reconsideration two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall become a law.

This diminishes the President's legislative power one-half. For whereas without this provision of the Constitution, or if his veto was absolute, he would possess one-third or four-twelfths of the legislative power, and the House and the Senate a like quantity, with this provision the House and the Senate, by a two-thirds vote, have the power to enact a bill into a law notwithstanding the President's objections. Therefore, ultimately five-twelfths of the legislative power of the Government reside in the House, a like quantity in the Senate, and the remaining two-twelfths in the President. Before, however, he exercises his right to negative the bill, and after it has passed both Houses and been sent to the President, neither one nor both of the Houses can recall it, and the President constitutionally makes it a law by signing it, or retaining it for ten days in spite of Congress, thus denoting as plainly as facts and their logic can denote the absolute possession of legislative power by the President at that juncture of the bill's career. Why should not the President have legislative power? Story, Kent, the authors of the Federalist, and others agree that the qualified negative of the President is necessary to the protection of the executive authority; that it is an important security against the enactment of rash and improper laws, as I trust will be demonstrated regarding the present bill; that it is a salutary check upon legislation, and "calculated to preserve the community against the effects of faction, precipitancy, unconstitutional legislation, temporary excitement, as well as political hostility." These reasons indicate that the legislative function of the President is of the very highest importance.

And there is yet another reason why he should have a portion of the legislative power. He selects seven of the most eminent and able citizens of the country to act as his advisers, and he and they, with a full knowledge of all the departments and bureaus of the Government, its secrets, if it has any, its necessities, and its dangers, are surely excellent judges of the propriety of bills which necessarily bear upon matters pertaining to the Government. How much Congress depends upon the President and heads of Departments in preparing legislation is well known here. If it were not for the information so obtained I apprehend that many gentlemen who make much ado on this floor would cut a sorry plight if their zeal would hold out.

Although vetoes are not numerous in the history of the Government, the occasions when they have been overruled by the requisite votes in Congress may be counted, if I am correctly informed, on the fingers of one's hand. This indicates that, although the President's negative is qualified, it is practically almost coextensive with the absolute negative possessed by the Senate or the House of Representatives.

Two notable instances in our history show that the vetoes not only killed the bills but converted majorities into minorities as to the measures in the Houses of Congress. The first was that of President Jackson, who, in 1832, vetoed a bill renewing the charter of the United States bank. So convincing was the reasoning of his veto message, or so docile were his party followers, that they took up his principal objection, which was the unconstitutionality of the proposed charter, and made it their party shibboleth, and from that day to this no democrat in the whole country could or can reconcile a United States or national bank with the Constitution. The other notable instance was the veto of the inflation bill by President Grant. Now, sir, in view of the demonstration, as I must think, of the proposition that the President has legislative power, and in view of the corollary that his approval of a bill, according to the theory of the Constitution, is indispensable to enact it into a law, unless two-thirds of each House of Congress overrule him, what name will denote, what phrase describe the confessed attitude of the majority in this House regarding the bill now before it? When the Army appropriation bill was pending the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] who is frank and outspoken, said:

> I am willing, and those with whom I stand are willing, to accept this issue, and we go further, we tender it. We are the ones to make the issue and we are ready for you to accept it. Planting ourselves upon this broad ground, we welcome controversy. We seek no quarrel with you, but for the first time in eighteen years past the democracy are back in power in both branches of this Legislature, and she proposes to signalize her return to power; she proposes to celebrate her recovery of her long-lost heritage by tearing off these degrading badges of servitude and destroying the machinery of a corrupt and partisan legislation.

We do not intend to stop until we have stricken the last vestige of your war measures from the statute-book, which like these were born of the passions incident to civil strife and looked to the abridgment of the liberty of the citizen.

* * * * * * *

I do not mean to issue a threat. Unlike the gentleman from Ohio, I disclaim any authority to threaten. But I do mean to say that it is my deliberate conviction that there is not to be found in this majority a single man who will ever consent to abandon one jot or tittle of the faith that is in him. He cannot surrender if he would. I beg you to believe he will not be coerced by threats nor intimidated by parade of power. He must stand upon his conviction and there we will all stand. He who dallies is a dastard, and he who doubts is damned. [Great applause on the democratic side.]

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MCMAHON,] in his speech of March 29, said:

I believe that we have made up our minds fully to take all the consequences before the people of an adherence to our views. If the President of the United States prefers to "starve the Government" * * * with him will rest the responsibility.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] said in a speech April 4:

For myself, President or no President, veto or no veto, I am prepared to fight upon this line until the work proposed is done, effectually done, whatever of time, labor, or expense it may involve.

And the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] in the last Congress, said:

They seemed further to agree, and I agreed with them, that if an extra session must be called, much as it is to be regretted, the very moment it is called the committees of both Houses would be organized and separate bills would be framed and passed as soon as possible asking the President of the United States to agree with the representatives of the States and people.

* * * * * * *

We insist that those matters pertain solely to the States and are part of their absolute right. * * * When these three laws are submitted to the President for his approval, as they will be, and are approved by him * * * the next Congress will in my opinion be ready to pass every appropriation bill. * * * If, however, the President of the United States, in the exercise of the power vested in him, should see fit to veto the bills thus presented to him, which I repeat will simply be to keep soldiers from the polls, to allow proper jurors to serve who will try cases honestly, and allow the States to control their own elections, then I have no doubt those same amendments will be again made part of the appropriation bills, and it will be for the President to determine whether he will block the wheels of government and refuse to accept necessary appropriations rather than allow the representatives of the people to repeal odious laws which they regard as subversive of their rights and privileges. * * * Whether that course is right or wrong, it will be adopted, and I have no doubt adhered to, no matter what happens with the appropriation bills.

It was said by another gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] whose ability and deliberation entitle his utterances to distinguished consideration, that "these laws," referring to the United States election laws, "must and shall be repealed." I quote the gentleman from memory. It has been decided by a democratic caucus that they shall be repealed. The repealing and modifying clauses are tacked to this appropriation bill, whose proper purpose is to supply the necessary means to sustain the Government in all its civil activities, and without which means the Government must cease to act. The menace is obvious; the purpose is evident. The majority says to the President "You must consent to repeal and modify these laws to suit us or the Government shall not have supplies."

There is but one word in the English language, in my opinion, which aptly and fully expresses the attitude of the majority, and that word is usurpation. It is an effort to wrest from the President the approval of a bill under the menace of anarchy. It is more than revolutionary: it is sheer, downright usurpation. It is an arbitrary arrogation of the legislative power of the President. It is a blow aimed at the heart of the Constitution.

The second proposition is that the repealing and modifying the United States election laws as proposed in the bill is supported on the ground that the Government of the United States has not the constitutional right to supervise and regulate elections of members of Congress, unless the States are in default in providing suitable election laws, and would thereby put a dangerous, if not fatal, interpretation on the Constitution.

It is unnecessary, in view of the repeated declarations of the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, to argue that the denial of the constitutional right of the Government to supervise and regulate elections of members of Congress, unless the States have failed to provide laws, is alleged as the chief reason for making the riders to the bill, because every gentleman, I believe, on the other side of the Chamber who has spoken to the question, has expressly alleged that the laws sought to be repealed are unconstitutional under existing circumstances. All who have spoken, so far as I have observed, insist that these laws are in violation of the Constitution. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] fairly represents and produces views which seem to be unanimously entertained by the democratic majority when he says:

I know that gentlemen undertake to sustain the constitutionality of this legislation by referring to a provision of the Constitution, article 1, section 4:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

The manifest and true construction of this provision is that in the event of the people of a State failing to make provision on these subjects Congress in the exercise of its discretion may make regulations on the subject, and that when States make regulations Congress may alter them as to "the times, places, and manner of holding elections."

What is the meaning of section 4 of article 1 of the Constitution? The section reads:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

In the first place, the contemporaneous construction of this section, coupled with the historical fact that there was then as now—though not so strictly a partisan division then as now—one portion of the people who desired the formation of a nation with a government possessing all the necessary attributes of sovereignty and the inherent faculties of preservation, will shed some light upon it. Madison and Hamilton, the one a democrat and the other a federalist, were distinguished leaders of this portion of the people. The present republican party holds these views. The other portion of the people desired a confederation of States with the attributes of sovereignty residing in each State and certain delegated powers in the "Federal Government," as they chose to call it. The present democratic party holds these views.

Now, during the first Congress some of the States recommended amendments to the Constitution, some of which were adopted and others rejected. Among them was the following, which was moved in the House by Mr. Burke:

Congress shall not alter, modify, or interfere in the times, places, or manner of holding election of Senators or Representatives except when any State shall refuse or neglect or be unable by invasion or rebellion to make such election.

During the progress of the debate on this motion Mr. Madison said:

Mr. Madison was willing to make every amendment that was required by the States which did not tend to destroy the principles and the efficacy of the Constitution. He conceived that the proposed amendment would have that tendency, and was therefore opposed to it.

Mr. Burke's motion was defeated. At this same session Congress proposed twelve amendments to the States, ten of which were ratified by them and are now the first ten amendments to the Constitution. Is it not plain, in the presence of these facts, that section 4 of article 1 should not be construed as contended for by the other side. Why, the construction sought to be placed on this section was submitted almost in hæc verba as an amendment, and was rejected, and was rejected, too, on the ground that it would "destroy the principles and the efficacy of the Constitution." So we have not only a contemporaneous interpretation by an able democratic leader adverse to the construction of the majority of this House, but we have an actual repudiation of it as a proposition.

In reply to Mr. Monroe in the Virginia convention of June 13, 1788, who put the following inquiry:

Mr. Monroe wished that the honorable gentlemen who had been in the Federal convention would give information respecting the clause concerning elections. He wished to know why Congress had an ultimate control over the time, place, and manner of elections of Representatives, and the time and manner of that of Senators; and also why there was an exception as to the place of electing Senator.

Mr. Madison said:

Mr. Chairman, the reason of the exception was, that if Congress should fix the place of choosing the Senators, it might compel the State Legislature to elect them in a different place from that of their usual sessions, which would produce some inconvenience and was not necessary for the object of regulating the elections. But it was necessary to give the General Government a control over the time and manner of choosing the Senators to prevent its own dissolution.

With respect to the other point, it was thought that the regulation of the time, place, and manner of electing Representatives should be uniform throughout the continent. Some States might regulate the elections on the principles of equality and others might regulate them otherwise. This diversity would be obviously unjust. Elections are regulated now unequally in some States, particularly South Carolina, with respect to Charleston, which has a representation of thirty members. Should the people of any State by any means be deprived of the right of suffrage, it was judged proper that it should be remedied by the General Government. It was found impossible to fix the time, place, and manner of the election of Representatives in the Constitution. It was found necessary to leave the regulation of this, in the first place, to the State governments, as being best acquainted with the situation of the people, subject to the control of the General Government, in order to enable it to produce uniformity and prevent its own dissolution. And considering the State government and General Government as distinct bodies, acting in different and independent capacities for the people, it was thought the particular regulations should be submitted to the former and the general regulations to the latter. Were they exclusively under the control of the State governments the General Government might easily be dissolved. But if they be regulated properly by the State Legislatures the congressional control will very probably never be exercised. The power appears to me satisfactory and as unlikely to be abused as any part of the Constitution.

In the second place, the obvious, fair meaning of section 4, article 1, is that Congress may at its pleasure, with or without reasons, at any time, by law, alter such regulations as the States may have made as to time, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, except as to the place of choosing Senators; or Congress may at its pleasure, with or without reasons, at any time, by law, make regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators, prescribing the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Repesentatives. The complement of this section are those portions of section 2 of article 1 which read:

The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

* * * * * * *

No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

And those portions of section 3, article 1, which read:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. * * * No person shall be a Senator, who shall not have attained the age of thirty years, and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of the State for which he shall be chosen.

And that portion of section 5 of article 1:

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

And section 2 of the fourteenth amendment:

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

Thus we find in the Constitution that the qualification of electors of a Representative shall be such as are requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature; that the Representative shall be chosen every second year; that he shall be at least twenty-five years of age; that he shall be a citizen of the United States; that he shall be an inhabitant of the State in which he shall be chosen; that a Senator shall be chosen by the Legislature of the State for six years; that he shall be at least thirty years of age; that he shall have been at least nine years a citizen of the United States; and that he shall be an inhabitant of the State for which he shall be chosen. And we find that Congress has power at any time by law to make regulations prescribing the times of holding the elections for Senators and Representatives, the places of holding such elections, except those of Senators, and the manner of holding such elections. We also find that each House shall be the judge of such elections, the returns, and the qualifications of those elected.

We further find that Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers; that the right of any male citizen of the United States twenty-one years of age to vote, unless forfeited by crime, for electors for President and Vice-President, Representatives in Congress, executive and judicial officers, or members of the Legislature of a State, shall not be denied or abridged.

All these provisions of the Constitution may be enforced by appropriate legislation. Now, sir, it seems to me to be perfectly clear that the powers conferred on Congress by the Constitution embrace everything that it is competent for the States to do in the matter of regulating elections for Senators and Representatives, except only as to the places of choosing Senators. And the powers not only embrace everything the States may do, with the single exception, but the exercise of them by Congress in making a system of laws relating to such elections would supersede and nullify the regulation of the States, for such system of laws when made by Congress becomes, by virtue of the second paragraph of article 6 of the Constitution, the supreme law of the land.

But the powers of Congress in controlling the elections for Senators and Representatives, not only embrace everything that it is competent for a State to do, but the fourteenth amendment augments these powers, and brings the elections for the judicial, executive, and legislative officers of the State measurably within the supervision of Congress.

Having the powers I have just enumerated, Congress may prescribe every necessary safeguard to a free, fair, honest election of its members. It may pass laws to prevent and punish illegal voting; to prevent and punish repeating; to prevent and punish ballot-box stuffing; to prevent and punish the use of tissue ballots; to prevent and punish all persons who make false counts, false returns, or take any step to defeat an honest expression of the popular will. In a word it may enact all necessary laws to prevent and punish those who by fraud, force, intimidation, bribery, or corruption, defeat an honest vote, an honest count, and an honest election.

The Government of the United States has the right and the power to preserve itself. Everything that may be necessary to its preservation and the integrity of the United States as a nation may be done by it through the constituted authorities. To prevent those from voting who have no right to vote, to protect those in voting who have the right to vote, and to prescribe such method and to appoint such officers for conducting elections as will secure these results—all these are clearly within the power of the General Government. The security of the ballot-box against all attacks, whether made insidiously under the guise of a strict construction of the Constitution or openly by lawlessness in any of its Protean forms, is the bulwark of free institutions and the liberties of the people. Do the laws sought by this bill to be repealed and modified transcend the competency of Congress to protect the freedom and purity of elections of its members? The proposition of the bill is to repeal the following sections of the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 2016. The supervisors of election, so appointed, are authorized and required to attend at all times and places fixed for the registration of voters, who, being registered, would be entitled to vote for a Representative or Delegate in Congress, and to challenge any person offering to register; to attend at all times and places when the names of registered voters may be marked for challenge, and to cause such names registered as they may deem proper to be so marked; to make, when required, the lists, or either of them, provided for in section 2026, and verify the same; and upon any occasion, and at any time when in attendance upon the duty herein prescribed, to personally inspect and scrutinize such registry, and for purposes of identification to affix their signature to each page of the original list, and of each copy of any such list of registered voters, at such times, upon each day when any name may be received, entered, or registered, and in such manner as will, in their judgment, detect and expose the improper or wrongful removal therefrom, or addition thereto, of any name.

SEC. 2018. To the end that each candidate for the office of Representative or Delegate in Congress may obtain the benefit of every vote for him cast, the supervisors of election are, and each of them is, required to personally scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot in their election district or voting precinct cast, whatever may be the indorsement on the ballot, or in whatever box it may have been placed or be found; to make and forward to the officer who, in accordance with the provisions of section 2025, has been designated as the chief supervisor of the judicial district in which the city or town wherein they may serve, acts, such certificates and returns of all such ballots as such officer may direct and require, and to attach to the registry list, and any and all copies thereof and to any certificate, statement, or return, whether the same, or any part or portion thereof, be required by any law of the United States, or of any State, territorial, or municipal law, any statement touching the truth or accuracy of the registry, or the truth or fairness of the election and canvass, which the supervisors of the election, or either of them, may desire to make or attach, or which should properly and honestly be made or attached, in order that the facts may become known.

SEC. 2020. When in any election district or voting precinct in any city or town, for which there have been appointed supervisors of election for any election at which a Representative or Delegate in Congress is voted for, the supervisors of election are not allowed to exercise and discharge, fully and freely, and without bribery, solicitation, interference, hinderance, molestation, violence, or threats thereof, on the part of any person, all the duties, obligations, and powers conferred upon them by law, the supervisors of election shall make prompt report, under oath, within ten days after the day of election to the officer who, in accordance with the provisions of section 2025, has been designated as the chief supervisor of the judicial district in which the city or town wherein they served, acts, of the manner and means by which they were not so allowed to fully and freely exercise and discharge the duties and obligations required and imposed herein. And upon receiving any such report, the chief supervisor, acting both in such capacity and officially as a commissioner of the circuit court, shall forthwith examine into all the facts; and he shall have power to subpœna and compel the attendance before him of any witness, and to administer oaths and take testimony in respect to the charges made; and, prior to the assembling of the Congress for which any such Representative or Delegate was voted for, he shall file with the clerk of the House of Representatives all the evidence by him taken, all information by him obtained, and all reports to him made.

SEC. 2021. Whenever an election at which Representatives or Delegates in Congress are to be chosen is held in any city or town of twenty thousand inhabitants or upward, the marshal for the district in which the city or town is situated shall, on the application, in writing, of at least two citizens residing in such city or town, appoint special deputy marshals, whose duty it shall be, when required thereto, to aid and assist the supervisors of election in the verification of any list of persons who may have registered or voted; to attend in each election district or voting precinct at the times and places fixed for the registration of voters, and at all times and places when and where the registration may by law be scrutinized, and the names of registered voters be marked for challenge; and also to attend, at all times for holding elections, the polls in such district or precinct.

SEC. 2022. The marshal and his general deputies, and such special deputies, shall keep the peace, and support and protect the supervisors of election in the discharge of their duties, preserve order at such places of registration and at such polls, prevent fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting thereat, or fraudulent conduct on the part of any officer of election, and immediately, either at the place of registration or polling place, or elsewhere, and either before or after registering or voting, to arrest and take into custody, with or without process, any person who commits, or attempts or offers to commit, any of the acts or offenses prohibited herein, or who commits any offense against the laws of the United States; but no person shall be arrested without process for any offense not committed in the presence of the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, or of the supervisors of election, or either of them, and, for the purposes of arrest or the preservation of the peace, the supervisors of election shall, in the absence of the marshal's deputies, or if required to assist such deputies, have the same duties and powers as deputy marshals; nor shall any person, on the day of such election, be arrested without process for any offense committed on the day of registration.

SEC. 2023. Whenever any arrest is made under any provision of this title, the person so arrested shall forthwith be brought before a commissioner, judge, or court of the United States for examination of the offenses alleged against him; and such commissioner, judge, or court shall proceed in respect thereto as authorized by law in case of crimes against the United States.

SEC. 2024. The marshal or his general deputies, or such special deputies as are thereto specially empowered by him, in writing, and under his hand and seal, whenever he or either or any of them is forcibly resisted in executing their duties under this title, or shall, by violence, threats, or menaces, be prevented from executing such duties, or from arresting any person who has committed any offense for which the marshal or his general or his special deputies are authorized to make such arrest, are, and each of them is, empowered to summon and call to his aid the bystanders or posse comitatus of his district.

SEC. 2025. The circuit courts of the United States for each judicial circuit shall name and appoint, on or before the 1st day of May, in the year 1871, and thereafter as vacancies may from any cause arise, from among the circuit court commissioners for each judicial district in each judicial circuit, one of such officers, who shall be known for the duties required of him under this title as the chief supervisor of elections of the judicial district for which he is a commissioner, and shall, so long as faithful and capable, discharge the duties in this title imposed.

SEC. 2026. The chief supervisor shall prepare and furnish all necessary books, forms, blanks, and instructions for the use and direction of the supervisors of election in the several cities and towns in their respective districts; he shall receive the applications of all parties for appointment to such positions; upon the opening, as contemplated in section 2012, of the circuit court for the judicial circuit in which the commissioner so designated acts, he shall present such applications to the judge thereof, and furnish information to him in respect to the appointment by the court of such supervisors of election; he shall require of the supervisors of election, when necessary, lists of the persons who may register and vote, or either, in their respective election districts or voting precincts, and cause the names of those upon any such list whose right to register or vote is honestly doubted to be verified by proper inquiry and examination at the respective places by them assigned as their residences; and he shall receive, preserve, and file all oaths of office of supervisors of election, and of all special deputy marshals appointed under the provisions of this title, and all certificates, returns, reports, and records of every kind and nature contemplated or made requisite by the provisions hereof, save where otherwise herein specially directed.

SEC. 2027. All United States marshals and commissioners who in any judicial district perform any duties under the preceding provisions relating to, concerning, or affecting the election of Representatives or Delegates in the Congress of the United States, from time to time, and, with all due diligence, shall forward to the chief supervisor in and for their judicial district, all complaints, examinations, and records pertaining thereto, and all oaths of office by them administered to any supervisor of election or special deputy marshal, in order that the same may be properly preserved and filed.

SEC. 2031. There shall be allowed and paid to the chief supervisor, for his services as such officer, the following compensation, apart from and in excess of all fees allowed by law for the performance of any duty as circuit court commissioner: For filing and caring for every return, report, record, document, or other paper required to be filed by him under any of the preceding provisions, ten cents; for affixing a seal to any paper, record, report, or instrument, twenty cents; for entering and indexing the records of his office, fifteen cents per folio; and for arranging and transmitting to Congress, as provided for in section 2020, any report, statement, record, return, or examination, for each folio, fifteen cents; and for any copy thereof, or of any paper on file, a like sum. * * * And the fees of the chief supervisors shall be paid at the Treasury of the United States, such accounts to be made out, verified, examined, and certified as in the case of accounts of commissioners, save that the examination or certificate required may be made by either the circuit or district judge.

SEC. 5522. Every person, whether with or without any authority, power, or process, or pretended authority, power, or process, of any State, Territory, or municipality, who obstructs, hinders, assaults, or by bribery, solicitation, or otherwise, interferes with or prevents the supervisors of election, or either of them, or the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, in the performance of any duty required of them, or either of them, or which he or they, or either of them, may be authorized to perform by any law of the United States, in the execution of process or otherwise, or who by any of the means before mentioned hinders or prevents the free attendance and presence at such places of registration or at such polls of election, or full and free access and egress to and from any such place of registration or poll of election, or in going to and from any such place of registration or poll of election, or to and from any room, where any such registration or election or canvass of votes, or of making any returns or certificates thereof, may be had, or who molests, interferes with, removes, or ejects from any such place of registration or poll of election, or of canvassing votes cast thereat, or of making returns or certificates thereof, any supervisor of election, the marshal, or his general or special deputies, or either of them; or who threatens, or attempts, or offers so to do, or refuses or neglects to aid and assist any supervisor of election, or the marshal or his general or his special deputies, or either of them, in the performance of his or their duties, when required by him or them, or either of them, to give such aid and assistance, shall be liable to instant arrest without process, and shall be punished by imprisonment not more than two years, or by a fine of not more than $3,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and shall pay the costs of the prosecution.

Now the sections which I have just read are those which the majority desire to have wholly repealed. The sections which they propose to amend are as follows:

SEC. 2017. The supervisors of election are authorized and required to attend at all times and places for holding elections of Representatives or Delegates in Congress, and for counting the votes cast at such elections; to challenge any vote offered by any person whose legal qualifications the supervisors, or either of them, may doubt; to be and remain where the ballot-boxes are kept at all times after the polls are open until every vote cast at such time and place has been counted, the canvass of all votes polled wholly completed, and the proper and requisite certificates or returns made, whether the certificates or returns be required under any law of the United States, or any State, territorial, or municipal law, and to personally inspect and scrutinize, from time to time, and at all times, on the day of election, the manner in which the voting is done, and the way and method in which the poll-books, registry lists, and tallies or check-books, whether the same be required by any law of the United States, or any State, territorial, or municipal law, are kept.

SEC. 2019. The better to enable the supervisors of election to discharge their duties, they are authorized and directed, in their respective election districts or voting precincts, on the day of registration, on the day when registered voters may be marked to be challenged, and on the day of election, to take, occupy, and remain in such position, from time to time, whether before or behind the ballot-boxes, as will, in their judgment, best enable them to see each person offering himself for registration or offering to vote, and as will best conduce to their scrutinizing the manner in which the registration or voting is being conducted; and at the closing of the polls for the reception of votes, they are required to place themselves in such position, in relation to the ballot-boxes, for the purpose of engaging in the work of canvassing the ballots, as will enable them to fully perform the duties in respect to such canvass provided herein, and shall there remain until every duty in respect to such canvass, certificates, returns, and statements has been wholly completed.

SEC. 2028. No person shall be appointed a supervisor of election or a deputy marshal, under the preceding provisions, who is not, at the time of his appointment, a qualified voter of the city, town, county, parish, election district, or voting precinct in which his duties are to be performed.

SEC. 2031. There shall be allowed and paid to the chief supervisor, for his services as such officer, the following compensation, apart from and in excess of all fees allowed by law for the performance of any duty as circuit court commissioner: For filing and caring for every return, report, record, document, or other paper required to be filed by him under any of the preceding provisions, ten cents; for affixing a seal to any paper, record, report, or instrument, twenty cents; for entering and indexing the records of his office, fifteen cents per folio; and for arranging and transmitting to Congress, as provided for in section 2020, any report, statement, record, return, or examination, for each folio, fifteen cents; and for any copy thereof, or of any paper on file, a like sum. And there shall be allowed and paid to each supervisor of election, and each special deputy marshal who is appointed and performs his duty under the preceding provisions, compensation at the rate of $5 per day for each day he is actually on duty, not exceeding ten days; but no compensation shall be allowed, in any case, to supervisors of election, except to those appointed in cities or towns of twenty thousand or more inhabitants. And the fees of the chief supervisors shall be paid at the Treasury of the United States, such accounts, to be made out, verified, examined, and certified as in the case of accounts of commissioners, save that the examination or certificate required may be made by either the circuit or district judge.

It is proposed to amend section 2017 by striking out the words "and required;" and that section 2019 be amended by striking out the words "for the purpose of engaging in the work of canvassing the ballots," and by striking out the words "in respect to such canvass;" that section 2028 be amended by striking out the words "or a deputy marshal," and by striking out the words "city, town, county, parish;" that all of section 2031 of said statutes, except so much thereof as relates to the pay of supervisors of elections, and that all other sections of the Revised Statutes and all laws and parts of laws authorizing the appointment of chief supervisors of elections, special or general deputy marshals of elections, and prescribing their duties and powers and allowing them compensation, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Now, in all these sections, those the majority insist upon repealing and those they insist upon amending, is there a provision, is there a clause, is there a word which tends in the remotest degree to infringe upon the rights of any law-abiding citizen or to hinder any man having the right to vote from voting? On the contrary, do they not all look to the protection of the rights of the honest voter, to a fair count, and to the declaration of the true result? They speak for themselves; they contain their own argument.

The third proposition is that this bill is objectionable because it proposes the repeal of certain sections of the Revised Statutes and to destroy the efficacy of others by amendments—all which sections I have just read—whose existence and enforcement are essential to pure and fair elections in many sections of the country.

The multitude of facts brought to the attention of everybody from time to time through the press, reports of committees of Congress, and other sources of information, sufficiently suggests the necessity of stringent regulations for the conduct of elections. I shall not undertake to recount these facts, but shall content myself with a few quotations from the report of the House in the Fortieth Congress appointed to investigate election frauds alleged to have been perpetrated in New York in 1868, and the report made by the committee of the Senate to the last Congress on the election outrages in Louisiana and South Carolina in 1878. The present United States election laws, which the democratic majority want repealed or modified into mere semblances of the things they are and ought to be, were largely the outgrowth and consequence of these frauds in New York, and were so framed as to preclude to a large extent the possibility of the repetition of the frauds. It is not surprising that the democracy wince under the constraint of these laws, for before their enactment they could count in New York City on any majority necessary to carry the State. How much the prospective presidential canvass of 1880 may influence them in their desire for the repeal and emasculation of these laws may be conjectured without difficulty.

But I will quote from the report of the committee. It sums up its conclusions as follows:

Among the most prominent of the frauds committed in the interest of the democratic party in the city and State of New York in connection with the election in November, 1868, are these:

1. Many thousands of aliens fraudulently procured or were furnished with certificates of naturalization illegally or fraudulently issued, by means of which they were enabled to register as voters, and voted in violation of law.

2. Many hundreds of certificates of naturalization were granted in the names of fictitious persons, to be used by native-born and naturalized citizens and aliens in falsely registering as voters and to enable them to vote many times at the election.

3. Many hundreds of persons voted in New York City from two to forty times, or more, each under assumed or fictitious names, fraudulently registered for the purpose.

4. Extensive frauds were committed in canvassing tickets, and names of voters were entered on the poll lists and democratic tickets counted as if voters representing them voted, when no such persons voted at all.

5. To accomplish these frauds, gross neglect of duty and disregard of law, so great as to evince a criminal purpose, prevailed in some of the courts, while officers and democratic partisans of almost every grade, either by official influence or otherwise, aided, sanctioned, or knew of and failed to prevent them. The same influence shielded the perpetrators in nearly all cases from detection or arrest, and when arrested they have, through the agency of judicial officers and others charged with the duty of prosecution, escaped all punishment.

6. Through these agencies the democratic electors of President and Vice-President and the democratic candidate for governor of the State of New York were fraudulently elected.

7. And the investigations of the committee show that existing State laws and the mode of enforcing them are wholly inadequate to prevent these frauds, but that Congress has the power to enact laws which, if faithfully executed, will to some extent furnish remedies hereafter.

The report of the Teller committee, as it is called, of the Senate regarding the elections of 1878 in Louisiana and South Carolina contains such a mass of outrages upon the rights of the voters that I can only quote a few selections as specimens. The report says regarding Caddo Parish, Louisiana:

The democrats declared, through the press and otherwise, their determination to carry the election. They organized a rifle company and cavalry companies, claiming that such organizations were necessary for the protection of the white people. In ward 1, with its southern boundary within five miles of Shreveport and its northern boundary on the Arkansas line, the voting place was located at the extreme northern part of the ward, about thirty-five miles from the southern boundary. The registered vote in this ward was, colored 325, white 15. Nineteen-twentieths of the voters were compelled to travel at least twenty miles, making a total trip of forty miles, through swamps and across bayous, to deposit their ballots. In the ordinary stage of water it would have been impossible for the voters to have reached the poll except by a water-route of sixty miles. It is claimed by the democrats that the republicans, when in control of affairs, had located the polling place at the lower end of the ward, and thus discommoded the voters of the north end. The republicans, on the contrary, insisted that there was at that time one voting place in the northern part and one in the southern. However this may be, the majority of the voters resided in the southern part of the ward. Notwithstanding the distance and the character of the country to be traversed, about three hundred voters made this trip, starting on Sunday night and reaching the polling place early on the morning of election. Two hundred and seventy deposited their votes for the republican candidates. But after the most of the voters had left for home a band of armed white men took possession of the ballot-box, and broke it up and destroyed the ballots, so no return was ever made from that voting place.

After showing a great variety of outrages in Natchitoches, Tensas, Concordia, Pointe Coupée, and Saint Mary's Parishes, the committee gives the following summary of murders and violence:

The examination of the committee, it will be seen, was confined to but seven of the fifty-two parishes of Louisiana. In these seven parishes the evidence shows there were murdered "for political purposes," during the campaign of 1878, John Williams, (page 45;) Robert Williams, (44, 57, 186, 192, 236, 347, 470;) Luke Wiggins, (44, 48;) Lot Clarke, (46, 58, 62;) Billy White, (46, 48, 62;) Greene Abrams, (49;) Josiah Thomas, (58;) Charles Bethel, (192, 236, 337, 347, 561;) William Singleton, (178, 191, 348;) Monday Hill, (186, 192, 236, 347, 469;) Louis Posthelwaite, (186, 347;) Richard Miller, (192, 236, 347;) James Starver, (192, 347, 473;) Commodore Smallwood, (236, 348, 355;) Charlie Carroll, (236, 355;) John Higgins, (278, 348;) "Doc." Smith, (347, 355, 359;) William Hunter, (348;) Hyams Wilson, (348, 355;) Wash Ellis, (348;) Asbury Epps, (244, 348;) John Robinson, (355;) Rufus Mills, (416.) Besides these there were fully as many others murdered, whose names the committee were unable to ascertain, whose corpses were seen, by witnesses who testified before the committee, hanging on trees or lying dead in the streets or fields. Dozens more were wounded, from shots fired at them with murderous intent, some of whom were present as witnesses before the committee exhibiting their scars; others were whipped, or beaten, and mutilated; wives were tied up by the thumbs and whipped for refusing to tell where their husbands were secreted; scores of leaders in politics among the colored men were driven from their homes, leaving their crops in the field and their families unprovided for. In brief, a literal "reign of terror" existed, and in fact still exists over a considerable portion of Louisiana as the result of the policy adopted by the democracy for perpetuating its rule in that State.

In South Carolina, which, like Louisiana, is naturally a republican State, all kinds of tricks and devices were resorted to, not only by the democrats in unlawful organizations, such as white-liners, white-leaguers, &c., but by the Legislature itself, to defeat fair elections. Charleston County has a population, by the State census of 1875, of 89,883 colored; 33,606 white. It has been a republican county from the organization of the republican party, and in 1876 gave a republican majority of over 6,000.

The report of the committee says:

The Legislature * * * began preparation for the next election by changing and abolishing the polling places in Charleston and other counties. The counties most affected by this act were those of Charleston, Colleton, Beaufort, and Orangeburgh—all republican counties. Some of the polling places abolished by this law had existed before the war, and the change of the polling places made it necessary for the voters to travel, in going to and from the polls, a distance of from twenty to forty miles. The polling places in Charleston County were reduced from fifty-five to thirty-two.

I forbear further quotations. My purpose in making those I have is not to stir up either sectional or party animosities, but to show the imperious necessity of national control of the elections for members of Congress, if the will of the people is to be respected.

No party can afford to extenuate such wrongs before the people of this country. By repealing and modifying the election laws as proposed, the opportunities will again recur for the perpetration of frauds in New York. In the Southern States these laws and their ministers are powerless. But even they cannot long afford to disregard and trample under foot the rights of a portion of this people. The great exodus now going on must admonish them that the day of reckoning has come. Righteousness will exalt us as a nation, but sin will bring many reproaches.

It must not be forgotten. The position should never be relinquished by the people of the United States that the United States is a nation. On that theory of our Government, carried into practical operation by the legislative, executive, and judicial departments, depend national unity, national perpetuity, and that homogeneity of our institutions which will inspire fealty and devotion on the part of all the people of our great Republic. It seems to be thought by the democratic party that the absorption of power by the General Government is fraught with dangers to the rights and liberties of the people. This is a faithless and wanton heresy. The power to enact such laws as may be necessary to redress wrongs and protect rights must reside in one of the governments under which we live. What difference does it make to the citizen, if his wrongs are promptly redressed and his rights effectually protected, which government, the State or National, does it? I believe in the least quantum of government—only so much as is indispensable to peace and good order. We know how the blind trust in legislation is misleading many otherwise good men. We find men who think that acts of Congress possess some subtle force, some mysterious alchemy, by which business can be revived or depressed according to their design. We have men among us who would make us all rich by an act of Congress containing an appropriation for a printing press. We see the social organism borne down with parasites in the shape of useless officers. Over-legislation, the dread of statesmen and philosophers, is visible everywhere. But I submit that the national legislature, with all its faults, and they are manifold, is less addicted to excesses of legislation than are the State Legislatures. The National Legislature has not "scaled" the obligations of the United States as have South Carolina, Georgia, Tennessee, Virginia, and other States. It has not created official sinecures for the favorites of political rings at the expense of the people, as several States North and South have done. No, the tendencies of national legislation, especially since the republican party has been in power, have been in the interest of the rights and liberties of the people and their general welfare. A vast majority of the people so think, and all such will cheerfully accord to the Government of the United States their allegiance and support, imbued with that patriotism which found its best expression when a million of the country's bravest men rushed to its defense against treason and rebellion, and conquered the Republic's unity and prosperity and the supremacy of the Constitution.

Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. THOMAS.]

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, as I have already stated, I am not able to speak this evening; and while I should like very much indeed to address the House on this subject, I shall be compelled to take my chances hereafter. Therefore I relinquish my right to the floor in favor of any gentleman who may desire to speak.

Mr. BAYNE. I yield to my colleague, [Mr. SHALLENBERGER.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I think I speak the sentiments of my constituency when I say that they find in the elaborate and able parliamentary conflict of words upon this floor for the past few weeks no palliation or excuse for the present extra session of Congress.

The country is rich beyond precedent in the productions of the soil; the capabilities of our peoples were never greater; yet workshops are closed and willing hands are idle. Why? Production waits upon consumption, and consumption upon employment, and employment upon capital, and capital waits a reasonable assurance that investments in industrial enterprises shall not be disturbed and imperiled by every returning Congress. Every material interest cries aloud at this moment against the threatened changes in our tariff and currency laws which a democratic majority upon this floor has so recently shown itself willing to precipitate upon the country at any moment. It is no excuse to affirm that currency and tariff laws can be improved in minor details. We admit the fact, but denounce the constant meddling as we should denounce the transplanting of young and thrifty trees every season, because perchance a little richer ground or a little better exposure could be found.

Where shall we look for a valid reason why this Congress should not adjourn and go home? Two distinct subjects are before us, and only two. First, to pass the needed appropriations; second, to change the election laws. The committees of both Houses are in running order; nothing else before them. The committee to which appropriations are intrusted has the floor day after day. The committee to which any and all changes in the election laws should be referred under the rules of the House and the practice of parliamentary bodies is called for reports day after day. Weeks are passing. The majority in the House and in the Senate have the power to pass both these measures in twenty-four hours just as they are if reported separately from the proper committees. Not a whisper of objection to that regular course is heard upon this side of the Chamber at this hour. The republican minority bitterly protest, but yield gracefully to superior numbers and refuse to obstruct. Again I ask, and the country will ask, why are not these two measures reported by separate committees in regular form and put upon their passage. There is no want of time as there might be in the closing days of a session. Besides, no man is rash enough to deny that they can be passed separately in one-fourth or one-tenth the time that will be required to pass them together.

You tell us, gentlemen of the majority, that you prefer to pass them together, and that is reason enough; but I submit that a better reason must be found. You tell us that free consent and independent action are absolutely indispensable, and resent the slightest suggestion upon this floor of the possible action of the Executive as indecent intimidation. You cannot, therefore, expect to get a single additional vote for the more objectionable measure by hitching it to the other; and you certainly are estopped from even suspecting that the President will be less sensitive than yourselves as to his constitutional duty to disapprove whatever his conscience cannot approve, without reference to your subsequent and equally independent action.

The strictest regard for the free and independent constitutional prerogatives of the House, the Senate, and the Executive may result in the failure of one or both of these bills. What then? Up to that point there is nothing to alarm the country. Bills have been vetoed before. The anti-Chinese bill passed both Houses by a large majority. It was vetoed. It failed to receive two-thirds majority over the veto. You did not refuse to pass any consular and diplomatic bill unless the anti-Chinese rider was attached. You would have found that subject germane to the Chinese consular service. You would have held that it tended to retrench expenditures because it was invented for the purpose of aiding the election of democratic officials. But you did not do it, and yet you expect the country to forgive you. You say a bare majority has the absolute right and it is their bounden duty to pass just such appropriation bills as they choose, burdened with such measures or coupled with such restrictions as they choose, and that if the President should exercise his constitutional right to disapprove, and more than one-third of this House exercise their constitutional right to disapprove, you will cut off supplies.

Are you aware, gentlemen, of the overwhelming condemnation of that principle by the American people as expressed in the organic law of three-fourths of the States of this Union? The free consent of the executive or the equally free consent of two-thirds of both branches of the Legislature, as a condition-precedent to the passage of any bill, is embodied in the constitutions of the following States: California, Colorado, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Nevada, New York, New Hampshire, Oregon, South Carolina, Texas, Virginia, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, Massachusetts, and Michigan. Maryland and Nebraska require three-fifths majority. Maryland says it is to guard against the encroachment of the legislative upon the executive and judicial departments of the Government. Some of these States—Illinois for instance—demand two-thirds of all elected, not simply present and voting.

The States of Colorado, Georgia, New York, and Pennsylvania, my own State, empower the executive to veto any item or items, the same to be void unless passed by two-thirds majority. These constitutions have been but recently amended, and accord with the growing sentiment of the country that the veto power of the executive should be increased rather than diminished. The constitution of my own State was adopted by a majority of one hundred and fifty thousand. My democratic colleagues upon this floor cannot afford to stand before such a constituency on the bare majority theory, independent of the Executive, nor can any man in the light of such facts. I need not stop here to argue the merits or defects of these election laws, as the majority have absolutely refused to permit any amendments to be offered. You picture in glowing colors, gentlemen, the abuses which are possible under these laws, but you decline to permit a suggestion to correct any possible abuse. You declaim against the partisan complexion of supervisors and marshals when you know that supervisors must be of different political parties and when you refuse to permit an amendment requiring deputy marshals to be equally or otherwise divided between the political parties, showing conclusively that you do not want any supervision at all, not even a perfectly fair supervision of elections.

Sir, what must be the inevitable conclusion in the minds of honest men? From the inherent weakness of your case, gentlemen, you are compelled to misrepresent the entire purpose and scope of these laws. You say the President of the United States may appoint these officers for the purpose of controlling an election at which he himself may be a candidate, when you know that the judges of the circuit courts of the United States appoint all supervisors, and never except upon the application of citizen voters residing in the district who desire to have the election "guarded and scrutinized." You know that deputy marshals cannot be appointed except upon the application of citizens, not to the President but to local authority. You boldly proclaim that all supervision of elections which confers the power to keep the peace and insure a fair count must cease, and that a bare majority of Congress must sit for two years rather than yield.

But, sir, let me ask who constitute this bare majority in the national House of Representatives that arrogates to itself the right to such extraordinary powers? By what superior title do you hold your seats, gentlemen of the majority? Without the slightest intention to cast any personal reflection, let me take up the Congressional Directory of the last session and name five gentlemen who are indebted to the magnanimity of two-thirds of a republican Congress in removing their disabilities for the very seats they occupy upon this floor. Hon. J. D. C. ATKINS, of Tennessee, chairman of the Committee of Appropriations, late of the confederate army and confederate congress; Hon. JOHN T. HARRIS, of Virginia, chairman of the Committee of Elections, late of the confederate legislature; Hon. JOHN H. REAGAN, of Texas, late postmaster-general of the Confederate States, chairman of the Committee on Commerce; Hon. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, of Georgia, chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, late vice-president of the southern confederacy; Hon. W. C. WHITTHORNE, of Tennessee, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, late adjutant-general of Tennessee during the rebellion. No other five men or five committees of this House have one-fifth as much control of the floor as these I have just named. I do not discredit the eminent ability of these gentlemen. They were men of mature convictions, of earnest purpose, and of unflinching courage when they staked their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor against this Government as they are now while engaged in the more peaceful work of shaping its destinies. How many votes of all parties do these five gentlemen represent? Group the districts and we have, by official figures, in round numbers, 96,000 all told.

I open the Congressional Directory to the State of Michigan, (my friend says Iowa, but I take Michigan as I have collated its figures;) I pass the first district, where a vacancy existed and no figures are given; I take the second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth districts, represented by Messrs. WILLITS, MCGOWAN, KEIGHTLEY, STONE, and BREWER respectively, all able gentlemen, but under democratic control of the House given but little prominence upon the floor; and what of their title—their constituency? Grouping the five districts they represent, I find the official figures give 192,000 voters, as against 96,000 for our five confederate friends. Contrast the power of 192,000 voters, always loyal, with 96,000 voters who "accept the situation." All this is constitutional, it is within the rules of this House, it is inevitable under democratic ascendency; it occurred in the last House under one of the ablest and most conservative Speakers that the democratic party could possibly elect. In the present Congress the South claims largely increased power. They say, "Thank God, we have captured the Capitol; we have come to enjoy our heritage; we will not rest until every vestige of your objectionable war measures is swept from the statute-books. So long as the North consents to elect democratic Congressmen who yield to southern dictation that policy will march on to completion, for the South is solid and will remain so." As I have referred to the last Congress, let me make one reference to the present Congress of a like character.

Alabama has eight congressional districts, in all of which 88,300 votes were cast at the last election for Representatives. As a State she is represented on sixteen committees of this House. Mississippi has six districts, in all of which less than 52,000 votes were cast. As a State shaping the legislation of this country she is represented on twelve committees of the House. Kansas, that young giant of the west, has three districts, in which nearly 138,000 votes were cast at the last election for her Representatives. As a State, whose free ballots should be heard from in legislative halls, she has representation on three committees of this House. Kansas has 3 votes upon this floor, is on three committees, backed by over 137,000 votes. Mississippi and Alabama have 14 votes, are on twenty-six committees, backed by only 140,000 votes.

My genial friend from Kansas, [Mr. ANDERSON,] with his 1 vote and his place on the Committee on Agriculture, speaks and acts for over 51,000 ballots, while the entire State of Mississippi, with her 6 votes and her work on twelve committees, speaks and acts for less than 52,000 ballots.

And what is the voice of Mississippi to-day, not the political utterances of her public men carefully revised in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but of her people who make her Representatives and will shape their policy?

I find in the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin, of April 21, the following, copied from one of her papers:

MUST BE VINDICATED.

The principle of secession must be vindicated. The Federal brigadiers, whom the Government educated in the doctrine of State rights, must be denied a voice in the restoration of the Republic, for they sinned with their eyes wide open to the enormity of coercing sovereign Commonwealths, and knew that it was point-blank treason.—Okolona (Miss.) Southern States, (Dem.)

[Extracts from the Okolona States, April 16, 1879.]

Let the speeches of Phillips and Sumner and Linkhorn, and all that stamp and brand of traitors be expurgated from the school-books of the country, and let the political works of Calhoun again form a part of the curriculum of our colleges.

We are taxed to pension Lincoln hirelings for killing our people, burning our homes, laying waste our fields, stealing our property, and hurling us headlong into ruin, poverty, and despair.

We are taxed to pay for the enforcement of false and fraudulent laws that were enacted to cow, humiliate, and put us utterly to shame.

We are taxed to pay the salary of a criminal who stole the Presidency.

We are taxed to pay the returning-board thieves and perjurers, and unhung scoundrels whom he appointed to office.

Down with the devil-born amendments!

Down with centralism and its hints of crown and scepter!

Down with the pictures of Lincoln and the scoundrels who surrounded him in the battle-days of '61-'65!

Down with every anti-democratic idea and idol!

These be the watch-words for 1880.

"REVOLUTION! Revolution! Revolution!" Yell the radicals at the top of their lungs.

Well, y-e-s. It is a revolution and no mistake.

The first have become last and the last first.

The Federal brigadiers have been collared and jammed into back seats and the confederates have been called to the fore.

But this is only the beginning.

Wait!

We are knocking the props from under your amendments.

Wait!

When the revolution has run its course there will be never a law nor a statute in the land that will conflict with State rights, the principle of secession, or white supremacy.

Wait!

But why all this? Sir, it is not to provoke passion or prejudice. It is in the hope rather of preventing that impending conflict which the unblushing demands of the democratic majority upon this floor, small as it is, constituted as it is, will inevitably provoke if carried into execution.

What are these demands? This, and nothing less: the United States shall waive all right to supervise its own elections, and deny itself all power to prevent armed interference therewith. A State may neglect or refuse to elect Representatives to the national Congress; in which case Congress may, in the exercise of a power which no one denies, under article 1, section 4, of the Constitution, proceed to fix time, place, and manner of such elections, in order to secure representation. And yet, if that State which neglected or refused to hold the election permits armed and lawless bands to interfere with the election ordered by Congress, amendments upon the Army bill provide a possible fine of $5,000 and imprisonment for five years at hard labor for any civil officer, not alone military and naval, but for any civil officer, who shall bring or keep armed men at those polls to keep the peace. A marshal may call upon citizens, not soldiers; and yet, if he arm them with power to quell a riot, he incurs the penalty named.

By the most unblushing misrepresentation of the proposed legislation the majority upon this floor seek to distract the attention of the country and cover the objectionable purpose. They decry lustily against the military at the polls and yet absolutely refuse to allow the republican minority to insert an amendment which shuts out completely both military and naval interference.

They boldly take up the cry, "Down with bayonet rule at the ballot-box," while the indictment against them by an outraged country for systematic armed interference with the freedom of the ballot is being read by every school-boy in the land. Equality before the law and the freedom of speech and of the ballot the idol of the solid South! Was ever a broader farce used as a cloak for the resuscitation of a principle which but recently cost this country such fearful sacrifice? Who can fail to recognize the heresy of the rebellion?

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] boldly asserted the other day, and not a whisper of dissent was heard from his associates:

It is unconstitutional for the United States to keep the peace in the States at the polls or elsewhere.

Subsequently the same was said by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. McMAHON:]

The United States can keep the peace, so called, nowhere.

The United States Mint at New Orleans may be surrounded by an angry mob, who threaten to take, as actually was taken in 1861, $500,000 in gold belonging to the tax-payers of the Union, and yet we are told the United States cannot keep the peace anywhere in the States. The most sacred rights of the freedmen to the elective franchise may be denied at an election every detail of which was ordered by Congress, and yet the United States cannot keep the peace at the polls.

Now, Mr. Chairman, no man upon this floor can possibly surpass me in demanding an election absolutely free from any interference, civil, military, or naval. Every instinct of the republican party has been and is in favor of a free election and a fair count. It is because of our love for absolute non-interference that we insist on retaining the power to prevent interference. I care not to discuss at this time the details of legislation now upon the statute-book. It is not a question of amending, but of expunging. The most eloquent periods of democracy are found to be assaults upon the personal character of officials or the abuse of power too loosely given or arbitrarily exercised. I have no defense for such things. I plead for their correction. But when they are used only to prevent the possible exercise of lawful and proper measures to protect the ballot, I have no sympathy for the criticism. The unworthy policeman or the inefficient system in some cities may lead me to an effort to dignify and elevate, but not degrade and destroy the office of policeman.

Mr. Chairman, I have listened with much interest and admiration to the logical disquisitions upon the constitutional powers of this Government as they come from the other side of this Chamber, but I cannot forget that in the troublous days of 1860 and 1861 many of these gentlemen, and others still more adroit, took up these same sections of the Constitution and proved conclusively to a large minority of the people of this country that the United States could claim no possible right to protect itself against disunion.

I have no regrets for the unparalleled magnanimity of the North. It was based on the hope that the heresy of State rights as against the Federal authority had been torn from the bleeding South and had been buried in the graves of her fallen sons. But, sir, when I read the later utterances of her deposed executive in the celebrated Macon letter; when I hear eulogies pronounced in the Senate of the United States upon the living incarnation of that fearful rebellion, and when I awake to the realization of the possible conflict that will one day check the progress of this same old heresy warming into life, I am justified in calling the attention of my countrymen to the folly of tempting the South as it was and the South as it is into the delusion of peacefully reaping all the results foreshadowed in their return to power. The remedy is simple. It involves no humiliation for any section of the country, no appeal to passion. It is but the quiet resolve, formed in the heart of loyal men of all parties, that the men who so recently attempted to destroy this country may bask in the sunshine of its magnanimity, but they cannot and shall not rule it. Why should they rule it? What of their history; their regard for human rights; their sympathy for free speech, a free press, and, above all, for free elections?

Hon. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, when vice-president of the confederacy, the venerable gentleman whom I esteem as one of the ablest and most conservative of the Representatives of the South, said at Savannah, March 21, 1861, in speaking of Jefferson:

The prevailing ideas entertained by him and most of the leading statesmen at the time of the formation of the old Constitution were that the enslavement of the African was in violation of the laws of nature; that it was wrong in principle, socially, morally, and politically. * * * Those ideas were fundamentally wrong; they rested upon the assumption of the equality of the races. This was an error. * * * Our Government is founded upon exactly the opposite ideas. Its foundations are laid. Its corner-stone rests upon the great truth that the negro is not equal to the white man; that slavery, subordination to the superior race, is his natural and normal condition. * * * They (anti-slavery men) assume that the negro is equal, and hence conclude that he is entitled to equal privileges and rights with the white man. If their premises were correct, their conclusions would be logical and just; but their premises being wrong their whole argument fails.

If the gentleman was wrong then and claims to be right now, in other words, to have repented, may I ask how long it may possibly take him to repent of his conversion, and are the rights and privileges of four million negro citizens safest in the hands of his party? But what of the freedom of the ballot? How many men in the South dared to vote for John C. Fremont or Abraham Lincoln, white men I mean, save at the peril of their lives? Said Hon. J. M. Mason, Senator of Virginia, May 16, 1861:

If it be asked what are those to do who in their consciences cannot vote to separate Virginia from the United States, the answer is simple and plain; honor and duty alike require that they should not vote on the question; if they retain such opinions they must leave the State.

The Louisville Journal, of June 1, says:

The vote of Virginia last week on the question of secession was a perfect mockery. The State was full of troops from other States of the confederacy, while all the Virginia secessionists, banded in military companies, were scattered in various places to overawe the friends of the Union and drive them from the polls.

Again, in its issue of the 13th:

The spirit of secession appears to have reached its culminating point in Tennessee. * * * The pretense of submitting the ordinance of secession to the vote of the people of the State, after placing her military power and resources at the disposal and under the command of the Confederate States without any authority from the people, is as bitter and insolent a mockery of popular rights as the human mind could invent.

I quote now from Greeley's American Conflict:

An attempt a short time before the election to hold a Union meeting at Paris, Tennessee, resulted in the death of two Union men, shot by the disunionists, and a notice that Hon. Emerson Etheridge would speak at Trenton, Tennessee elicited the following correspondence:

"TRENTON, TENN., April 16, 1861.

"To J. D. C. ATKINS and R. G. PAYNE:

"Etheridge speaks here on Friday. Be here to answer him Friday or next day."

The following is the answer to the above:

MEMPHIS, April 16, 1861.

To Messrs. ——:

I can't find ATKINS; can't come at that time. If Etheridge speaks for the South, we have no reply; if against it, our only answer to him and his backers must be, cold steel and bullets.

R. G. PAYNE.

Parson Brownlow, in his experiences among the rebels, says:

For separation and representation at Richmond, East Tennessee gave 14,700 votes. One-half of that number were rebel troops, having no authority under the Constitution to vote at any election. For no separation and no representation, East Tennessee gave 33,000 straight-out Union votes, with at least five thousand quiet citizens deterred from coming out by threats of violence and by the presence of drunken troops at the polls to insult them.

And yet this is the State and Mr. ATKINS one of the men who are to protect the purity of the ballot and the freedom of elections.

Rev. John H. Aughey, a Presbyterian clergyman of northern birth, who settled in Mississippi, and whom I personally knew as a gentleman of credibility and character, says of the election in Mississippi for the election of delegates which assumed to take that State out of the Union:

Approaching the polls I asked for a Union ticket and was informed that none had been printed, and that it would be advisable to vote the secession ticket.

In southern communities a voter had just the same right to be a Unionist that he had to be an abolitionist; that is, none at all. May 23, 1861, West Virginia held an election to ratify or reject the ordinance of secession. Three days after the election General George B. McClellan, good democratic authority, from his headquarters at Cincinnati, issued an address to the Union men of West Virginia, in which he testified:

The General Government has long enough endured the machinations of a few factious rebels in your midst. Armed traitors have in vain endeavored to deter you from expressing your loyalty at the polls.

Governor Hicks, of Maryland, issued an address to his people April 18, 1861, in which he said:

The people of this State will in a short time have the opportunity afforded them in a special election for members of Congress of the United States to express their devotion to the Union or their desire to see it broken up.

Here was a special election separate and distinct from a State election, where United States officers alone were to be elected, an election which was to be accepted by the people of a State as deciding the momentous question of union or disunion, peace or war, and yet the democratic doctrine upon this floor to-day affirms that the United States is and should be utterly powerless under the Constitution to protect those polls against the high crimes of Tennessee by and through which the majority of that State were forbidden by armed interference at the polls to hold the State loyal to the old flag.

Sir, guard the use of even civil power at the polls; punish every abuse of the power held by marshals and deputy marshals; strike for that high ideal of elections in a free republic when not a finger of authority, State or national, shall be needed at the polls to keep the peace, but never, never while human nature and the practices of men remain as I have pictured them and as elections in this country within the last ten years abundantly prove them, never relinquish the power to prevent that armed interference which has made the sanctity of the ballot the football of insurrectionists and traitors.

And, now, in conclusion, I love the old Constitution; I admire the genius of those great men who have expounded it; I respect the decisions of the Supreme Court which has interpreted it; but, sir, the Union existed before the Constitution, which was designed to establish a more perfect Union, not to create it. There comes a time when the nation must interpret its own will. That time came in the recent past. Amid the thunders of artillery that shook a continent, above the dying wails of countless thousands of our bravest men, drowning the moans of stricken families, the nation's interpretation of its Constitution rang out in clarion notes and treason quailed. The later amendments to the Constitution voice that will hitherto unwritten. The United States has the power to keep the peace on every foot of ground over which its flag may lawfully float; in every village, town, hamlet, or city of every State of this Union where the United States has a duty to perform in protecting its property, collecting its revenue, or guarding its polls; and, having that power, will use it, as it has in days gone by, to protect its citizens of every race, color, and condition in every right conferred upon them.

Representatives, so called, may prove recreant to duty and refuse supplies which they hold in trust for a brief period; but, sir, the sovereign people who once rescued this fair land from the designs of a solid South at the point of the bayonet, and by the voluntary sacrifice of blood and treasure unparalleled, will be equally quick now as then to discern impending danger, equally free with wealth and wisdom to sustain a loyal administration, equally prompt to send from every voting precinct of the North enough recruits to constitute a multitudinous army, not of bayonets but of ballots, which will voice their will in committees and in legislation upon this floor that need not bring the blush of shame to the cheek of every loyal man.

Mr. PRICE. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. CHITTENDEN, indefinitely, on account of important business; and

To Mr. CABELL, for three days from to-morrow, on account of business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted for withdrawal of papers from the files of the House in the following cases, there being no adverse reports:

To Mr. WHITTHORNE, in the cases of Reuben S. Jones, A. M. Boyd, and Lucinda McGuire;

To Mr. WILLITS, in the case of Mrs. Elizabeth B. Custer;

To Mr. BLACKBURN, in the case of James Saffell; and

To Mr. VAN AERNAM, in the case of Charles Pratt and others.

CONGRESSIONAL ELECTION IN IOWA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House papers relating to the congressional election held in the ninth district of Iowa on the 5th of November, 1878; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER. At the session of this evening the chair will be occupied by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] as Speaker pro tempore. The hour fixed by the order of the House having arrived, the House now takes a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., and was called to order by Mr. THOMPSON as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The session of to-night is held for the purpose of debate upon the legislative appropriation bill, no other business being in order.

Mr. WADDILL. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. WADDILL. Mr. Chairman, I am perhaps violating a custom of this House in rising to address this committee, this being my first term as a Representative on this floor. I had thought, sir, that I would take no part in this discussion, so far as addressing the committee, at least; but I am here representing my constituents, and I esteem my duty to them far higher than any mere formal custom, and, prompted by these motives alone, I shall say what seems to me proper to be said. I shall not, however, attempt an elaborate speech on the question under consideration. That has already been done by older and more experienced gentlemen than I. Indeed, I think there has been much more discussion than the simplicity of the issue demanded.

There is no great constitutional question involved in the issue here presented as to the power of the majority to repeal laws in the manner proposed in this bill. There is no republican lawyer on the other side of the House who has denied either the right or the lawful power of this side of the House to pass this bill or the Army appropriation bill already passed. On the contrary, the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] and many others on that side admit both the right and the constitutional power.

Let us look at the issue joined in this debate for a few moments. What is proposed to be done in this bill, and what was proposed to be done in the Army appropriation bill already passed the House?

In the Army appropriation bill it was provided that the Army should not be used at any election poll in any of the States of the Union to keep the peace unless at the request of the State Legislature, or of the governor when the Legislature could not be convened—simply the substantial provision of the Constitution which has existed since the formation of the Government.

In the present bill it is sought by this side of the House to repeal obnoxious and vicious statutes, which give to the party in power, or any party which may come after it, the power to appoint an indefinite number of men, called deputy marshals, and in effect to absolutely control the elections in all cities having twenty thousand population or over. It amounts simply to that. These deputy marshals have unlimited powers of arrest over the citizen coming to exercise the highest right of a freeman—that of casting a freeman's ballot for whomsoever he may choose. No complaint is necessary, no warrant is required to make this arrest, but only the imperial and absolute will of a deputy marshal appointed by and through the machinery of the party in power, and need I say appointed to do its will.

Is this such a law as should obtain in this free Republic? Is this such a law as the freemen in this country desire? I say no. I denounce it as anti-American, as against the genius and spirit of free institutions, and against both the spirit and the letter of our free Constitution. But the lawful power to repeal these laws in the manner proposed by the majority in this bill being admitted on each side, and therefore disposed of, the only question which I shall consider is the policy and justice of repealing them. Is it right to repeal these laws? Is it just to the interest of the people of this country? Gentlemen on the other side argue that it is coercive of the Executive, and therefore revolutionary, and even charge the democratic party, through its representatives on this floor, with the design of bringing about a revolution. I have but few words to say on this subject. Every student of history knows that the history of our mother country, Great Britain, from which we in the main are descended, and drew most of our laws, is full of precedents of this character, whereby the rights of the Parliament and the freedom of the people were wrung from an unwilling king.

The English Commons have again and again refused to vote supplies to the Crown until their just redress of grievances was secured and obnoxious orders and practices were repealed and abrogated. The history of our own country is just as replete with precedents. It has been the practice in this country for many years to attach to appropriation bills similar legislation to this. Indeed, the history of the republican party itself is full and overflowing with precedents. And the very measures now sought to be repealed by the democratic majority in this House were passed by a republican Congress and became laws as amendments to an appropriation bill; and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] who now shouts "revolution" so lustily was one of the managers of the conference committee which reported the bill. But I shall not enter into a detailed recital of the numerous precedents of this kind. That has already been done by gentlemen who have preceded me.

Now, sir, with this history and record staring gentlemen on the other side in the face, with what poor grace must they appear in the eyes of the country and the world charging upon the democracy revolution for seeking to repeal obnoxious and anti-republican laws by the same means and in the same manner in which a republican Congress passed them years ago.

Sir, the democratic party of this country to-day, through its representatives here, is making a fight for free institutions, free elections, and free ballots, and upon this platform it is willing to stand and be judged by the people. No man on this side, as I understand my associates, shrinks from the issue or its responsibility. No man on this side, in my opinion, will falter in the path of duty so manifestly opened up before him.

If this be revolution, then I confess I know not what revolution means. It is simply a determination on the part of the majority in this House to repeal obnoxious, oppressive, anti-American, unrepublican, and unconstitutional partisan legislation. It is sought to be done in a peaceful and constitutional way, and by the usual and lawful methods, and the wild charge of revolution is but the flimsy pretext and vain subterfuge of men who are trying to dodge, and who are seeking to raise false issues on which to go before the people in 1880.

Why is it that gentlemen on the other side have in a succession of bitter and impassioned speeches sought to fire the hearts of the people of the North and West, and raise before the startled gaze of a whole nation the specter of a new rebellion and a democratic revolution? Why the florid and disgusting efforts of so many gentlemen on the other side to rekindle the dead ashes of a dead and buried rebellion? What do gentlemen mean by looking over to this side and sneeringly speaking of "rebel brigadiers?"

Mr. Chairman, there are others on this side besides "rebel brigadiers." There are ex-Union soldiers here, standing side by side with ex-confederate soldiers in this grand struggle for a free ballot. There are on this side many who "wore the blue" in the late unhappy war. I myself, sir, was a Union man, and when but a boy of seventeen years enlisted in the Army of my country to fight for the preservation of this Union. And were it to come again to-day as it did in 1861, I would enlist now as then. I did it because I believed I was right; and, sir, so did the men of the South. They were just as honest, just as sincere when they took their stand beneath the stars and bars as was I, or any other sincere Union man, when he stood beneath the grand old flag of our country. No reasonable, thinking man can doubt this; and I do not propose to enter into an argument to convince unthinking and unreasonable fanatics.

But standing here to-day as an ex-Union soldier, I denounce as cowardly and mean beyond the power of characterization the jeering taunt of "rebel brigadier" on the part of one member of this House to another. The issues of the late war have been settled for fourteen long years, and it is the instinct of the jackal and not of a man to burrow down and raise them from their moldering tomb. What has the legislation proposed on this bill to do with the late rebellion or its adherents? Ah, Mr. Chairman, it is evident, even to the stupid, that gentlemen are seeking to dislodge from the thoughts of the people the great questions of their material interests and welfare which to-day and for many days past have been engrossing their attention.

The republican party of this nation is pledged and wedded to its financial policy of hard money, gold, and contraction. A policy which, with other republican mal-legislation has ruined and bankrupted hundreds of thousands of our people, swept away all values in the West, and wiped out as with a sponge the industries of a great people. To-day that party, hearing the muttering thunders of the people's wrath and seeing the "hand-writing on the wall," is seeking to dodge the issues which the people propose to submit, and to raise a storm of excitement over an imaginary democratic revolution and the spectered ghost of a new rebellion. And thus swinging the "bloody shirt" and crying "revolution," "rebellion," and "rebel brigadiers," the plunderers and despoilers of the industries of a great people propose to take a new lease of power in 1880.

But, gentlemen republicans, sharp and shrewd politicians as you are, mark a prediction: The people of this country will not be deceived or misled by this piece of political jugglery. The question which will be fought out on the political battle-field of 1880 is the question of finance. No possible adroitness on the part of politicians, no false alarms, no cry of a new rebellion, no shriek of revolution, no waving of the "bloody shirt," can change or alter the determination of a bankrupt and long-suffering people. When you raise your false alarm to attract their attention, they will demand work and bread. When you cry a new rebellion, they will demand the unlimited coinage of silver, and the issue of silver certificates both on silver coin and bullion, and the receiving of these certificates by the Government for all debts due to it of all characters whatsoever. When you shriek revolution, they will demand greenbacks, the abolition of the national banks, and the substitution of greenbacks for national-bank notes. And, lastly, when you wave the "bloody shirt," however artistically it may be done—and I admit you are experts—they will demand no further issue of bonds by the Government, and the rapid cancellation of the interest-bearing debt of the nation by payment in the vast quantities of silver dollars which an unlimited coinage will give to the country.

These will be the prominent issues which the people of the country will demand to be settled by the election of 1880. And, Mr. Chairman, when these great issues are settled, and settled in the way demanded by the people, that prosperity and happiness, that contentment and peace, and that rich abundance which in a nation possessing the vast resources of our grand country is the birthright and inheritance of every industrious citizen, will fall upon our land like a blessed benediction, and the nation will speed on in its grand march of progress, pushed forward by the faithful hands and robust strength of its contented and devoted citizens. Then will true peace come with blessed healing in its wings; then there will be no cry of rebellion; then there will be no wild shouts of revolution; then there will be no tearing open of the healed wounds of a terrible war; and then, too, like Othello's, will be gone the occupation of that species of eight-by-ten statesmen, the spawn of civil commotion, the monster products of morbidity in nations, whose only capacity is to inflame evil passion, and whose only occupation is to stir up bitter strife between those who should be friends and brethren; and with their occupation gone they will step down into that obscurity for which God and nature so fitly prepared them, and the nation will be at rest and the people will rejoice.

Mr. CRAVENS. Mr. Chairman, the statute upon the subject of elections proposed by this bill to be repealed is in my judgment one of the most objectionable ever enacted by the Congress of the United States. It is objectionable for the reason that it destroys or is calculated to destroy the free and untrammeled choice by the States, or "by the people of the several States," of their Representatives in the Congress of the United States. The guarantee in this regard is found in section 2, article 1, of the Constitution, in these words:

> The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

The choice is to be made not only by the States, but by the identical electors who, under the laws of the States, are authorized to make choice of members to a similar representative body in the State governments, in which provision there seems to be great propriety. That under this paragraph of the Constitution the qualifications of the voters at elections for Representatives in Congress are determinable by the laws of the several States, admits of no sort of question. The language is so unequivocal, and the decisions of the Supreme Court referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] in the debate upon the Army appropriation bill are so clear, that no member upon this floor, as yet, has dared to deny it.

This same section provides that no person shall be a Representative "who shall not when elected be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen." It further provides for the apportionment of Representatives "among the several States," that "each State shall have at least one Representative," and that until the enumeration therein provided for shall be made "the State of New Hampshire shall be entitled to choose three, Massachusetts eight," &c. Elsewhere in the Constitution reference is made to the State or to the people. To arrive at undeniable conclusions as to the correct interpretation of the Constitution in many particulars is deemed important in the discussion of this bill, and to that end I appeal to the records of the Supreme Court of the United States.

In 1795, William Paterson, of New Jersey, one of the justices of the Supreme Court, and one of the framers of the Constitution, in the decision of a cause used the following language:

> I conclude, therefore, that every particle of authority which originally resided either in Congress or in any branch of the State governments was derived from the people, who were permanent inhabitants of each province in the first instance and afterwards became citizens of each State; that this authority was conveyed by each body-politic separately, and not by all the people in the several provinces or States jointly, and, of course, that no authority could be conveyed to the whole but that which previously was possessed by the several parts; that the distinction between a State and the people of a State has in this respect no foundation, each expression in substance meaning the same thing.

From this it appears that in the earlier times of the Government no distinction was made between the expression "a State" and "the people of a State."

As late as the December term of the court, 1868, Chief-Justice Chase, speaking for the court, after declaring the supremacy of the Government of the United States, within the scope of the powers with which it is invested by the Constitution, said:

> On the other hand, the people of each State compose a State, having its own government and endowed with all the functions essential to separate and independent existence. The States disunited might continue to exist. Without the States in union there could be no such political body as the United States.

This is the language of one distinguished alike as a judge and as a statesman, and who held, politically and judicially, the Union and the States under the Constitution equally indestructible.

Later and at the same term of the court, in speaking of the sense and meaning of the term "a state generally," as well as with reference to the use of the word in our Constitution, he expressed himself in the language following:

> It describes sometimes a people or community of individuals, united more or less closely in political relations, inhabiting temporarily or permanently the same country. Often it denotes only the country or territorial region inhabited by such a community. Not infrequently it is applied to the government under which the people live. At other times it represents the combined idea of people, territory, and government. It is not difficult to see that in all these senses the primary conception is that of a people or community. The people, in whatever territory dwelling, either temporarily or permanently, and whether organized under a regular government or united by looser and less definite relations, constitute the state. This is undoubtedly the fundamental idea upon which the republican institutions of our country are established. It was stated very clearly by an eminent judge, (William Patterson, of New Jersey,) in one of the earliest cases adjudicated by this court, and we are not aware of anything in any subsequent decision of a different tenor. In the Constitution the term State most frequently expresses the combined idea just noticed of people, territory, and government. A State, in the ordinary sense of the Constitution, is a political community of free citizens, occupying territory of defined boundaries, and organized under a government sanctioned and limited by a written constitution and established by the consent of the governed. It is the union of such States under a common constitution which forms the distinct and greater political unit, which that Constitution designates as the United States, and makes of the people and States which compose it one people and one country.
> The use of the word in this sense hardly requires further remark. In the clauses which impose prohibitions upon the States in respect to the making of treaties, emitting of bills of credit, and laying duties of tonnage, and which guarantee to the States representation in the House of Representatives and in the Senate, are found some instances of this use in the Constitution. Others will occur to every mind. But it is also used in its geographical sense, as in the clauses which require that a Representative in Congress shall be an inhabitant of the State in which he shall be chosen, and that the trial of crimes shall be held within the State where committed.
> And there are instances in which the principal sense of the word seems to be that primary one to which we have adverted, of a people or political community, as distinguished from a government.
> In this latter sense the word seems to be used in the clause which provides that the United States shall guarantee to every State in the Union a republican form of government and shall protect each of them against invasion. In this clause a plain distinction is made between a State and the government of a State.

The unmistakable points deducible from these adjudications of the Supreme Court are that the States, representing the combined idea of people, territory, and government, under the clause first quoted from section 2, article 1, of the Constitution, are entitled to choose Representatives in Congress, and that the words "by the people of the several States" are equivalent in meaning to the words "by the several States." Language more decisive could not be used and logic or reasoning more convincing could not be employed.

It is difficult to imagine how a people or body-politic, with a written constitution and laws, could be held to make choice of representatives in any legislative body except in conformity to the laws created by themselves for their own government as such body-politic in the selection of elective officers.

All republican governments must necessarily provide the means of election, the agencies through which the voice of the electors can be taken and the result ascertained. The States, by the more perfect bond of union by them, adopted the Constitution, and in the capacity aforesaid—for no sane man can deny their existence at that time in the sense of a people, territory and government—expressly reserved to themselves the right of choice of representatives in the Congress of the government created by that instrument. Prior thereto, under the articles of confederation, the right of each State, in its own way and in conformity to its own laws, to choose delegates to the Congress of the United States had been enjoyed, and, therefore, its enjoyment under the government to be created by the Constitution was provided for in like manner, although limitations were to be placed upon the suffrage of the States, and each have a vote and voice in the House of Representatives equal only to the number of members, while before each State had an equal vote and voice, no matter whether represented by many or only a few delegates. The States, jealous of their rights and of none more so than that of equality, could not yield more even for the sake of a more perfect union, and therefore provided for perfect equality in the Senate, and for protection for all time to come, guarded against being deprived of it by amendment, or otherwise, without their consent.

To-day Rhode Island is the peer of New York in that body; but doubtless it would have been otherwise had the States at the date of the adoption of the Constitution been less jealous of their rights of independence and equality.

Looking to the history of the States from the beginning of their struggle for independence up to the date of the establishment of the Constitution between them by their own voluntary ratifications in the capacity of independent sovereignties, as by that instrument provided, no warrant can be drawn for assuming that they intended to yield the freedom of the ballot in the choice of their agents or servants, upon whose vote and voice their perpetuity and prosperity so greatly depended.

No, sir; the men of that day rather than have yielded the right of raising revenues to others than those of their own choice, selected in their own way, would have accepted war as preferable.

Their gallantry and the true spirit of freedom which alone must have animated them and given success in their unequal and bloody struggles forbid the thought of their having made concessions by which their voice could be stifled by Federal bayonets, Federal supervisors, or other appliances under Federal authorization.

It is manifest that the people of the States did not intend to confer upon the Federal Government any authority or power whatever through or by means of which they in their sovereign and governmental capacity could be deprived of the most perfect freedom in determining the qualifications of their own voters, or be deprived of judging of their qualifications, by and through the means provided by their own laws, at any and all elections.

There is not a paragraph or clause in the Federal Constitution which gives the slightest sanction to the assumption of such power by the Federal Government.

By some who attempt to maintain the validity of the provisions of the statute proposed to be repealed, it is claimed that the authority for their enactment is conferred by the following paragraph of section 4, article 1, of the Constitution:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators.

What is the evident object of this provision? It was an imperative necessity for the Legislatures of the States to prescribe the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives, because until elected there could be no Congress. After this, then, as now, the means or instrumentalities to be used to hold elections, the times, places, and manner being prescribed, had to be furnished by the State; such, for instance, as poll-books, judges, and clerks of election. The State authorities then as now had necessarily to declare the result of the elections primarily.

Without this, then as now, no man could think of obtaining a seat in Congress without question. How is it possible under the Constitution for the House of Representatives to be organized unless those who ask for membership present some sort of declaration of their election from the State authorities, it being expressly provided by the Constitution that Representatives shall be chosen by the people of the several States?

Whatever other construction may be put upon this provision, it cannot be reasonably insisted that it authorizes the Federal Government to interpose or interfere at all in the actual holding of elections by the States for their Representatives.

It is my impression that Congress exhausted its power in this regard as to time by fixing the times of holding the elections, as to place by providing for the elections by districts, and as to manner by declaring they should be by ballot.

The propriety of this legislation by Congress no one questions, and that it was under the authority conferred by that paragraph no one can doubt. In the passage of these laws the general purpose of that provision of the Constitution was accomplished, that general purpose evidently being to secure uniformity in the times, places, and manner of holding the elections by the States for their Representatives in Congress.

The laws passed and whatever laws it may be practicable and lawful for the Congress to pass regulating the times, places, and manner of holding such elections are and would be directory or mandatory, if you choose, to the State authorities. The Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof shall be the supreme law of the land—so says the Constitution—and are alike binding and obligatory upon citizens and officials, both Federal and State. The officials of both classes are required to make oath or affirmation to support the Constitution, and neither can be said to do this without yielding implicit obedience to all laws made in pursuance thereof. Laws of Congress relating to the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives both citizens and officials will ever with good cheer obey. The House of Representatives, being the judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own members, will ever and always command obedience on the part of the people of the several States to the laws of Congress prescribing the times, places, and manner of holding elections for their Representatives in Congress.

This I say will ever be true of each and every State so long as and whenever they are entitled to representation in Congress at all. While this is true, I assert that the people of the several States have not consented and never will consent that the Federal Government shall hold the elections in the States, but will always insist upon their right to choose in the capacity of States their Representatives in Congress by their own votes, with the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of their Legislatures under their own constitutions and laws, and through the means appointed by their own laws for ascertaining their choice of election officers. But some men in their blind fury for pretexts to justify infractions of the Constitution and invasions of the rights of the States in the choice of their Representatives claim, because the House of Representatives is the judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own members, that therefore the Congress is authorized to pass laws to prevent frauds at the elections in the States.

In answer it is sufficient to say that the House of Representatives is not the Congress of the United States, and therefore the power to judge can pass no law upon that or any other subject. We hold that the law-making power of the States is the proper source from which must emanate the means to protect against fraud therein, such power being derived by grants from the people in their sovereign capacity, as they are primarily the source of all power in republican governments. Were it otherwise the elections for Representatives could not be said to be holden "by the people of the several States." The elections of Representatives "by the people of the several States" are effected through their retained sovereignty—that not granted to the Federal Government.

By our system State governments not in harmonious relations with the General Government under the Constitution are not entitled to representation in Congress at all, while those occupying such relations of course are, and while yielding support to the Constitution and laws enacted thereunder are entitled to the fullest protection under them of their reserved rights, as well as those expressly guaranteed by that instrument.

The House of Representatives, then, if true to the Constitution under which it is convened, in judging of the elections of its own members, can only look to facts to determine whether those applying for membership are the true choice of the people, made conformably to the laws of the States they ask to represent as well as the United States statutes relating to the times, places, and manner of holding elections in the States for Representatives. As I have said before, the State authorities must adopt some means of ascertaining the result; but the means adopted may not be perfect, so that persons may be declared elected who may not be in point of fact the true choice of the people. To correct evils of that kind and make good the guarantee of the Constitution that the people shall be represented by persons of their own choosing, the two Houses are made the judges of the elections, qualifications, and returns of their own members. It is useless to argue further this point, for it certainly will occur to the dullest comprehension that the authority to judge does not embrace that to legislate. No one can be legislated into the House, not even by the power of both branches of Congress. Because the House may disregard the certificate of election given to one by the State authorities and admit some one else as a member, argues nothing against the right of choice by the States. All courts of any sort of respectability hold that a certificate of election or a commission does not confer title, but that it requires an actual election to vest title. All, then, that the House may do is to judge of the actual election of its own members. This right the States granted, none other, and in so doing only added an additional safeguard to the purity of their own elections.

To show something of the relations of the States to the indissoluble government of the Union, created by the establishment of the Constitution between them, I make the following quotation from the decision of Chief-Justice Chase, to which allusion was last made:

> But the perpetuity and indestructibility of the Union by no means implies the loss of distinct and individual existence or of the right of self-government by the States. Under the articles of confederation each State retained its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right not expressly delegated to the United States. Under the Constitution, though the powers of the States were much restricted, still all powers not delegated to the United States nor prohibited to the States are reserved to the States or to the people. And we have already had occasion to remark at this term of the court "that the people of each State compose a State, having its own government, and endowed with all the functions essential to separate and independent existence," and that "without the States in union there could be no such political body as the United States." Not only can there be no loss of separate and independent autonomy to the States, through their Union under the Constitution, but it may be not unreasonably said that the preservation of the States and the maintenance of their governments are as much within the design of the Constitution as the preservation of the Union and the maintenance of the National Government.

Now, while this distinguished judge declares the indissolubility of the Union under the Constitution, yet it is clear from his reasoning that to destroy autonomy in the States, including the free and untrammeled choice of Representatives, the dissolution of both governments as contemplated by our system would necessarily follow. Can a republican government exist without a law-making power, and does not the Federal Government exercise this through the Congress, made up from Representatives and Senators chosen by the States? If the rights of States are blotted out in this regard can there remain any lawful law-making power in the Federal Government? There are duties to be performed by the Federal Government toward the States. Invasions of their rights weakens its own power and may be carried to the extent of destroying both. I know the judge in delivering this opinion was considering the right of a State to dissolve its relations with the Federal Government, and I admit the correctness of his conclusions upon that point. That is settled; but when it comes to considering what the General Government may do in the way of dissolution by the use of unwarranted power, that is another thing. He was writing from the stand-point of the inviolability of the Constitution by the Federal power.

If from the present law, that sought to be repealed, which attempts to authorize Federal officials to challenge and judge of the qualifications of voters in the States fixed by State laws and make arrests on election days upon suspicion and without warrant, further and continued aggressions be made until the elections shall be held by Federal officials exclusively, can the States be said to have Representatives in Congress of their own choosing?

By this accomplishment the Union under the Constitution would be at an end and for the reason that the Constitution itself would be totally ignored. The Government in that case would be one of force in contradistinction to that of a government of Constitution and laws. While we may pray Heaven to avert the day when each and every State of the now Union shall fail or decline under Federal supervision to send representatives to the Congress of the United States, yet the anarchy that would follow such a result cannot be misconceived. If we can suffer our minds to contemplate such an exigency, it must be observed that the Government would remain intact in only two of its departments, the executive and judicial.

What would follow? There being no Congress to guarantee to the States, in the sense "of a people or political community," governments republican in form as contemplated by the Constitution, when their relations with the Federal Government are disturbed the Executive would be left without chart or guide, and, without the support of the people of the States, powerless to restore the order and government ordained by the Constitution, denominated in the preamble to that revered instrument "a more perfect union." Such action on the part of the States would produce complications from which we could not escape it is feared with safety.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] alludes to such a possibility as follows:

> For example, if the people of the United States should say we will elect no Representatives to the House of Representatives. Of course, this is a violent supposition; but suppose that they do not, is there any remedy? Does the Constitution provide any remedy whatever? In two years there would be no House of Representatives; of course, no support of the Government, and no Government. Suppose, again, the States should say through their Legislatures we will elect no Senators. Such abstention alone would absolutely destroy the Government; and our system provides no process of compulsion to prevent it.

Such a result can never come without a cause. The people of the several States are not dissatisfied with the grants of power made by them to the Federal Government, and will never complain at its rightful exercise. To be secure against such and like calamities we need only to maintain the Constitution in its integrity. The people have placed limitations upon the governments, both National and State, and so long as authority may be exercised within these limitations there can be no inharmony between them, and there need be no cause of alarm. But let either overstep and go beyond their constitutional authority; the people will not silently submit, but in some form or other will in time put an end to the usurpation. The American heart is so fully imbued with the spirit of liberty as that usurped power cannot hope long to abridge the freedom of the people under any government. They in their majesty, when lost for the time being, will regain against every attempted usurpation the right of choice of their representatives.

Now, through their Senators and Representatives, who understand fully the popular will and obey it, they propose to strike from the Federal statutes provisions born of party craft abridging that blood-bought right.

Neither the President nor any one else can condemn this their most just demand for the repeal of a law inimical to their interests. They are the source of all power, and their will lawfully expressed, and this they do through the Congress, the law-making power under the Constitution, the Executive cannot well refuse to sanction except for overpowering reasons, such as ought to be alike satisfactory to the people themselves as well as to their Senators and Representatives. To offer such objections as satisfies the public mind of the unconstitutionality of an enactment of Congress will justify the exercise of the veto power. Such other objections as will indubitably change the public mind against an enactment may possibly justify it; but to offer the hackneyed objections of partisans struggling for supremacy no President can afford. This we are told the President will do. I hope not. The veto power was lodged with him for no such purpose, but the more exalted one of securing healthful and beneficial laws. Is it reasonable to believe that one so renowned as to be the choice of the American people for so distinguished a station will be swayed by party predilections or prejudices to veto a measure securing the same liberty and freedom to them in their choice of Representatives as that by which the President and Vice-President are chosen?

Presidential electors are elected by the States without any sort of lawful supervision or control by Federal officials, and why should not Representatives be chosen in like manner?

Neither the President nor any member upon this floor can assign any valid reason against it. The ultraists who framed the supervisors law dared not embrace the election of electors in so many words.

The most hideous of all the doctrines advanced to support these laws relating to supervisors is the one that Congress derives the authority to pass them from section 4, article 4, of the Constitution. That section is as follows:

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.

The Supreme Court decides, as shown by the quotation already made, that the term State is used in this section in the sense "of a people or political community as distinguished from a government," and that it is to the States in that sense the United States guarantee republican forms of government and protect against invasion. The language of the court could not be more emphatic in the establishment of that point.

This view has the full support of common sense. It was certainly not intended that the United States should change, alter, modify, or in any manner disturb the governments existing in the States at the date of the adoption of the Constitution.

That section cannot be regarded as a declaration upon the part of the people of the States adopting the Constitution that their governments were not republican in form, and as imposing an obligation upon the United States to make them such.

The States ratifying the Constitution were such in the combined sense of people, territory, and government, and by their union under the Constitution in that capacity the Government of the United States was created.

The doctrine that a State government, with Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States, is not republican in form, and that the Congress can go to work and change, alter, or modify it to make it republican, they still retaining their seats, is shocking to the commonest intelligence and in the extremest degree. Under the Constitution that fact alone settles the character of the government to be republican in form.

That the Congress may declare the government in a State not to be republican in form cannot be denied, but that such cannot be done with the State represented in it needs no denial.

Chief-Justice Taney, in the case of Luther vs. Borden et al., with reference to this provision of the Constitution, said:

> Under this article of the Constitution it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State. For as the United States guarantee to each State a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the State before it can determine whether it is republican or not. And when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority. And its decision is binding on every other department of the government, and could not be questioned in a judicial tribunal.

The judgment of the court, delivered by Chief-Justice Chase in the case of Texas vs. White, from which quotations have been made, is equally strong in language, and affirms the correctness of the opinion in the case of Luther vs. Borden et al.

Now, each and every State in the Union has Representatives in Congress, and each must therefore have a government republican in form. No Representative upon this floor dare rise in his place and say that either his own or any other State has not a government in form republican. Why, then, all this talk about the authority of Congress to legislate under that provision of the Constitution, when there is not a State in the Union without a government republican both in form and in fact?

I do trust the members of this House may come to the discussion of questions of such gravity as the one now before us in soberness and sincerity, and not defame the name of the American Congress by giving interpretations to the Constitution totally devoid of both reason and patriotism. We represent intelligent constituencies, and it is due to them and ourselves that no act be done or left undone affecting their rights in the selection of our successors for which an honest, patriotic, and intelligent reason cannot be given.

It will not do to say that party interests demanded that this or that be done or left undone. The people are entitled to and demand representation through Representatives of their own choosing as guaranteed by the Constitution. As of old they regard this "a right inestimable to them and formidable to tyrants only." To say that they are incapacitated to choose, and therefore must be supervised, is treason against their liberties and cannot be spoken, save by the blasphemous tongue of a tyrant. Sir, it is in behalf of constitutional liberty that I speak and demand the repeal of these obnoxious statutes, and in doing so I but reflect the voice of my constituency, democrats and republicans alike, with perhaps an occasional exception.

Mr. DWIGHT. Mr. Chairman, the bill we are discussing is attracting in an unusual degree the attention of the people of the whole country. Its title shows its importance, which is in the words following:

A bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

This bill must pass or the three branches of the Government named in the title will be obliged to suspend their operations after the 30th day of June next, or if they continue they will do so in violation of law. The general provisions of the bill are in the usual form, and are perhaps as satisfactory to the members of this House and to the people as such bills are expected to be. Why, then, did it not pass as it should have passed before the expiration of the last Congress? This important inquiry is agitating the public mind, and in this House has raised an issue that cannot be evaded. Upon its proper settlement the whole question of good government rests.

Ordinary matters of difference sink into insignificance before the gravity of the issue presented by the majority. The total amount appropriated by this bill might be adjusted, in many respects, so that it would be essentially improved, but as I have before said we are not now objecting to minor details. The minority, both in the last and in the present Congress, have shown a willingness to compromise differences, and are altogether indisposed to block the wheels of legislation by unnecessary objection. The objection to the bill as presented is fundamental. To abandon it would be to abandon principle. To compromise would be to yield where good government demands firmness.

The majority propose to repeal laws, which were placed on the statute-book by an overwhelming necessity, to preserve the purity of elections. They go outside and beyond the usual methods for the enactment of law by incorporating such a provision on an appropriation bill and they say to the minority in Congress and to the Executive of the nation, "Unless you aid us in repealing these laws, we will cut off your supplies." Sir, such action and such demands are as reckless and as revolutionary as the drawn sword of open rebellion. It is of no consequence how the Government is revolutionized; whether it is done by armed resistance to its constitutional and legal authority or by withholding the means necessary to enable it to perform its functions and perpetuate its existence. The Army, which has been educated, fed, clothed, and equipped by the nation, and which has taken a solemn oath to sacrifice life, if need be, in defense of the honor and perpetuity of the Government, is no more sacredly bound to the discharge of its duty than is the legislative branch of the Government, and the former is no more guilty of unfaithfulness and treason when it betrays its trust and joins the enemy and helps to destroy the power that nurtured it than is the latter when it raises its sacrilegious hand to smite the Government to death by refusing to supply it with the means necessary to its life. Both alike are acts that should subject the guilty to the doom and the punishment which traitors deserve.

I trust that I may be justified in repeating some truths of history. I greatly regret that the southern democracy is constantly creating the necessity for referring to these truths. The chairman of this committee, the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] in a speech made by him on the 3d instant, if I remember the date correctly, alluded to the repealing clauses which were proposed in the Army bill, involving substantially the same principles now under discussion, and said:

I am willing, and those with whom I stand are willing, to accept this issue; and we go further, we tender it. We are the ones to make the issue and we are ready for you to accept it. Planting ourselves upon this broad ground, we welcome controversy. We seek no quarrel with you, but for the first time in eighteen years past the democracy are back in power in both branches of this Legislature, and she proposes to signalize her return to power, she proposes to celebrate her recovery of her long-lost heritage, by tearing off these degrading badges of servitude and destroying the machinery of a corrupt and partisan legislation.

We do not intend to stop until we have stricken the last vestige of your war measures from the statute-book, which, like these, were born of the passions incident to civil strife and looked to the abridgment of the liberty of the citizen.

I quote the gentleman's language on the occasion referred to, as it perhaps embodies more fully than any other gentleman has expressed it the purposes of the majority in seeking to repeal the enactments which have been in the way of ballot-box stuffers and repeaters. This startling statement is repeated in language more or less forcible whenever there is an opportunity by the gentleman and his friends who conspired with him in the mad effort, apparently not yet abandoned, to destroy the Government.

The distrust and alarm aroused throughout the country by the language used by the gentleman cannot be allayed by the repeated explanations he has since made.

It is observed that he has not yet specifically stated what legislation is included within the terms employed by him. Where will he draw the line in striking from the statute-book the "war measures?"

It is notorious that the people of the rebellious States, with few exceptions, believe that the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution "were born of the passions incident to civil strife." Will the gentleman and his friends "strike" from the statute-book the legislation without which these "amendments" are inoperative?

That the democracy is back in power after eighteen years is a joyful occasion with them no doubt. But their bugle-note is blown too soon and too loud for their good. The people have heard and, hearing, have, I trust, resolved that such sentiments shall not triumph now no more than they did in 1861–'65. The hand is outstretched for the coveted heritage, but the people have recognized it as a traitor's hand, and once again, as I hope and believe, it shall fall paralyzed and powerless ere it grasps the prize.

It is wiser to judge a party by what it has done than by what it has said, and the oft-repeated acts of the democratic party in the South and in several of the larger cities of the North say, in terms that cannot be misconstrued, that she intends to tear off all "badges of servitude" at the ballot-box by surrounding it, not with Union bayonets, but with rifle clubs, by protecting it vigorously from republican votes, and purifying it with all the processes known to New York repeaters and South Carolina stuffers.

Mr. Chairman, you and your coadjutors have a great horror of elections, however fairly and honestly conducted, that give majorities against your party. The election of 1860, which placed as good and as able a President in the presidential chair as ever occupied it, honest Abraham Lincoln, was a fair and free election. No one complained of its being conducted unfairly, but it resulted against you, and you complained of it, and affirmed that it afforded you just cause for rebellion. Whenever your party was victor, no matter how responsible it was for frauds, you have never complained. When elections are honest and go against you, you make yourselves hoarse with the cry of "Fraud! Fraud!"

I am not aware that any party possesses an inheritance in the sense that the eloquent and figurative gentleman from Kentucky claimed it for his degenerate party. I admit that the democratic party in the days of Jackson earned the heritage of a good name by daring to be honest and executing the laws. It also had a record for being in favor of honest money then which it has not now. It had a record for the confinement of human slavery within its prescribed limits and for a fearless dealing with nullifiers and disunionists. And President Jackson made another record and left it as a heritage for his party in the shape of a letter which I will read, and I desire to have it embodied as a part of my remarks:

Letter of General Jackson, Globe, page 32, Thirty-sixth Congress.

[Private.]

WASHINGTON, May 1, 1833.

MY DEAR SIR: I have had a laborious task here, but nullification is dead, and its actors and courtiers will only be remembered by the people to be execrated for their wicked designs to sever and destroy the only good government on the globe, and that prosperity and happiness we enjoy over every other portion of the world. Haman's gallows ought to be the fate of all such ambitious men who would involve their country in civil war and all the evils in its train that they might reign and ride on its whirlwind and direct the storm.

The free people of these United States have spoken and consigned these wicked demagogues to their proper doom. Take care of your nullifiers, you have them among you; let them meet with the indignant frowns of every man who loves his country.

The tariff, it is now [and he italicises or underscores the word "now"] known, was a mere pretext; its burden was on your coarse woolens. By the law of July, 1832, coarse woolen was reduced to 5 per cent. for the benefit of the South. Mr. Clay's bill takes it up and classes it with woolens at 50 per cent., reduces it gradually down to 20 per cent., and there it is to remain, and Mr. Calhoun and all the nullifiers agree to the principle.

The cash duties and home valuation will be equal to 15 per cent. more, and after the year 1842 you pay on coarse woolens 35 per cent. If this is not protection, I cannot understand. Therefore, the tariff was only the pretext, and disunion and a southern confederacy the real object.

The next pretext will be the negro or slavery question.

My health is not good, but improving a little. Present me kindly to your lady and family, and believe me to be your friend. I will always be happy to hear from you.

ANDREW JACKSON.

The Rev. A. J. CRAWFORD.

The party as then existing hated nullification, treason, secession, and repudiation; but this "heritage" was not bequeathed to those who succeeded later to its then honorable title. In 1854 it began to "tear away its badges of servitude." It tore away the Missouri compromise line for the demarcation of slavery. Later it tore away freedom of elections in Kansas by invasion, armed possession of the polls, murder, and arson.

Permit me to quote as a part of my speech a portion of the report of the majority of a congressional committee which was made to Congress on the subject of the election held in Kansas March 30, 1855, which was managed and controlled by the democratic party, and in accordance with its then and present most approved notions of fair elections:

On the same day that the census was completed the governor issued his proclamation for an election to be held on the 30th of March, A. D. 1855, for members of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory. It prescribed the boundaries of districts, the places for polls, the names of judges, the apportionment of members, and recited the qualification of voters. If it had been observed a just and fair election would have reflected the will of the people of the Territory. Before the election false and inflammatory rumors were busily circulated among the people of western Missouri. The number and character of the emigration then passing into the Territory were grossly exaggerated and misrepresented. Through the active exertion of many of its leading citizens, aided by the secret society before referred to, the passions and prejudices of the people of that State were greatly excited. Several residents there have testified to the character of the reports circulated among and credited by the people. These efforts were successful. By an organized movement, which extended from Andrew County in the north to Jasper County in the south and as far eastward as Boone and Cole Counties, Missouri, companies of men were arranged in irregular parties and sent into every council district in the Territory, and into every Representative district but one. The members were so distributed as to control the election in each district. They went to vote, and with the avowed design to make Kansas a slave State. They were generally armed and equipped, carried with them their own provisions and tents, and so marched into the Territory. The details of this invasion form the mass of the testimony taken by your committee, and is so voluminous that we can here state but the leading facts elicited.

First district—Lawrence: The company of persons who marched into this district was collected in Ray, Howard, Carroll, Boone, La Fayette, Randolph, Macon, Clay, Jackson, Saline, and Cass Counties, in the State of Missouri. Their expenses were paid, those who could not come contributing provisions, wagons, &c. Provisions were deposited for those who were expected to come to Lawrence in the house of William Lykens, and were distributed among the Missourians after they arrived there. The evening before and the morning of the day of election about one thousand men from the above counties arrived at Lawrence and camped in a ravine a short distance from town, near the place of voting. They came in wagons (of which there were over one hundred) and on horseback, under the command of Colonel Samuel Young, of Boone County, Missouri, and Claiborne F. Jackson, of Missouri. They were armed with guns, rifles, pistols, and bowie-knives, and had tents, music, and flags with them. They brought with them two pieces of artillery loaded with musket-balls. On their way to Lawrence some of them met Mr. N. B. Blanton, who had been appointed one of the judges of election by Governor Reeder, and, after learning from him that he considered it his duty to demand an oath from them as to their place of residence, first attempted to bribe him and then threatened him with hanging in order to induce him to dispense with that oath. In consequence of these threats he did not appear at the polls the next morning to act as judge.

The evening before the election, while in camp, the Missourians were called together at the tent of Captain Claiborne F. Jackson, and speeches were made to them by Colonel Young and others, calling for volunteers to go to other districts where there were not Missourians enough to control the election, as there were more at Lawrence than were needed there. Many volunteered to go, and on the morning of the election several companies, from one hundred and fifty to two hundred each, went off to Tecumseh, Hickory Point, Bloomington, and other places. On the morning of the election the Missourians came over to the place of voting from their camp in bodies of one hundred at a time. Mr. Blanton not appearing, another judge was appointed in his place; Colonel Young claiming that, as the people of the Territory had two judges, it was nothing more than right that the Missourians should have the other one to look after their interests; and Robert A. Cummings was elected in Blanton's stead because he considered that every man had a right to vote if he had been in the Territory but an hour.

The Missourians brought their tickets with them, but not having enough they had three hundred more printed in Lawrence on the evening before and on the day of election. They had white ribbons in their buttonholes to distinguish themselves from the settlers.

I also copy what the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] said here the other day in confirmation of the truth of the majority report, as he was present and saw it:

Now, Mr. Chairman, March 28, 1855, was the first day I ever saw within the Territory of Kansas. I came up from Kansas City, Missouri, to the town of Lawrence, in company with these one thousand men whom I saw afterwards at the polls in that town casting their ballots for the election of the Legislature of that Territory. I can vouch for the truth of the foregoing statement.

I desire also to show what was the result of that election, two sections of the old statutes of the Territory of Kansas that were afterwards enacted by that Legislature, enactments made possible in consequence of elections carried in that way by mobs and armed forces, accompanied by artillery. I was there and know myself the accuracy of what I state.

I will now give a few of the results that immediately followed the most approved democratic methods of conducting elections, and which they are now and here so vigorously contending to perpetuate.

The following are the two sections of the statutes above referred to:

SEC. 12. If any free person, by speaking or by writing, assert or maintain that persons have not the right to hold slaves in this Territory, or shall introduce into this Territory, print, publish, write, circulate, or cause to be introduced into this Territory, written, printed, published, or circulated in this Territory any book, paper, magazine, pamphlet, or circular containing any denial of the right of persons to hold slaves in this Territory, such person shall be deemed guilty of felony, and punished by imprisonment at hard labor for a term of not less than two years.

SEC. 13. No person who is conscientiously opposed to holding slaves or who does not admit the right to hold slaves in this Territory shall sit as a juror on the trial of any prosecution for any violation of any of the sections of this act.

On the 5th of May, Judge Le Compte delivered a charge, highly partisan in its character, to the grand jury of Douglas County, of which the following extract is in his own words:

"This Territory was organized by an act of Congress, and so far its authority is from the United States. It has a Legislature elected in pursuance of that organic act. This Legislature, being an instrument of Congress, by which it governs the Territory, has passed laws; these laws, therefore, are of United States authority and making, and all that resist these laws resist the power and authority of the United States, and are, therefore, guilty of high treason. Now, gentlemen, if you find that any persons have resisted these laws, then must you, under your oath, find bills against such persons for high treason. If you find that no such resistance has been made, but that combinations have been formed for the purpose of resisting them, and individuals of influence and notoriety have been aiding and abetting in such combinations, then must you still find bills for constructive treason; the blow need not be struck, but only the intention may be evident."

The following is from the report of the Committee of Claims of the House of Representatives on "Kansas claims:"

In the mean time the remainder of the force, comprising several hundred men, with United States muskets and fixed bayonets, were taking position in the town. Men endeavored by argument, and women by tears, to alter the determination of Jones, but in vain. At three and a quarter o'clock he announced to Messrs. Eldridge that he would give them till five to remove their families and furniture from the house. The work of pillage had already commenced; the contents of the printing offices were scattered in the streets, and the red flag planted on the roof, first of the office of the Herald of Freedom and afterward on the Eldridge House. The family of Mr. G. W. Brown were driven from their house, and the immediate pillage of the hotel prevented only by the resolute interference of a few citizens, aided by some individuals of the mob, who kept a strict guard at the doors and insisted the families of the proprietors should have the time promised by Jones in which to collect their most necessary effects and leave. At last the cannon were placed and ready, and it was announced to Colonel S. W. Eldridge that the bombardment would commence in five minutes. His wife and children and such personal effects as they had been enabled to collect were placed in carriages and driven off between files of United States bayonets and amid the yells of the impatient mob. As they left the town the first boom of a cannon told that the work of destruction had begun. Soon (as the impression made by the cannon was not great) the building was fired, and with the aid of gunpowder reduced, with its furniture and stores, to a pile of ruins.

The work of pillage spread through the whole town, and continued until after dark. Every house and store which could be entered was ransacked, trunks broken open, and money and property taken at will. Where women had not fled they were in some cases insulted, and even robbed of their clothing. From one house over $2,000 in money were carried away. The house of Charles Robinson was pillaged and burned to the ground. The same evening the forces were drawn off to their camp, and the sack of Lawrence was concluded.

Some incidents of this authorized outrage here demand mention. While Messrs. Topliff and Perry were aiding the marshal in making the arrests both their houses were broken open and pillaged. Some of the flags which floated beside that of the Union had for mottoes, "Superiority of the white race;" "Kansas the outpost;" "South Carolina;" while one had the national stripes, with a tiger in place of the Union; another had alternated stripes of black and white. While the cannon were being placed for the destruction of the Eldridge House, David R. Atchison, late Vice-President of the United States, was conspicuous among the mob. When the final doom of the hotel and the printing-offices was pronounced it was said by the officials to be by order of the Government, as the grand jury of Douglas County had ordered them abated as nuisances. The only charge against the Eldridge House was its ownership by the Emigrant Aid Company.

It will be observed at this period that the democratic party had no such fear of military encroachments and usurpations as has now taken possession of it. On the contrary, they used all the military force they could command at the polls and everywhere else where necessary to accomplish their hellish purposes.

Mr. Chairman, I now desire to call attention to the reasons that placed the law you seek to repeal upon the statute-book.

First, I give the memorial of a committee of the Union League Club of the city of New York to Congress:

[Fortieth Congress, third session. Senate Mis. Doc. No. 4.]

Memorial of a committee of the Union League Club of the city of New York, praying the appointment of a special committee to investigate the naturalization and election frauds and irregularities perpetrated in the recent election in the city and State of New York.

DECEMBER 14, 1868—Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, a committee of the Union League Club of the city of New York, respectfully represent that the said association, embracing more than a thousand loyal citizens of New York, having resolved at a meeting held on the 4th of November that in their deliberate judgment a large majority of the legal voters of the State voted for Grant, Colfax, and Griswold, and that that vote of the majority had been overruled and subverted by wholesale fraud, appointed the undersigned to investigate the said matter, and to institute such measures in connection therewith as they might deem expedient and proper; and that after a careful investigation the undersigned do now, on behalf of the said body and of the law-abiding community of New York, respectfully represent as follows:

I.—AS TO THE FACT OF A LARGE FRAUDULENT VOTE.

By a comparison for the past eighteen years of the election statistics of the city of New York with the census returns of the United States and of the State of New York, it is evident that the vote reported as cast in the city of New York in the recent election for presidential electors and State officers was larger than the actual number of legal voters in the city, and still larger than the number of legal votes cast by them in the said election.

Referring to the tabular statistical statements hereto appended (see schedules marked 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7) in regard to the city and county of New York and the county of Kings, including the city of Brooklyn, as illustrating the point, they show that a careful comparison of statistics of population and elections, extending over twenty years, demonstrates the fact—

First. That the rate of annual increase in the number of voters in this city is 4 per cent. per annum; and,

Second. That the proportion of votes cast to the whole number of legal voters has ranged from 70 to 90 per cent., and that at least 10 per cent. for absentees should be deducted from the total number of voters to show the number who actually vote.

The State census of 1865 (see table 3) shows the whole number of votes cast in the city that year to have been	128,975
Which, increased at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, made the whole number of votes in 1868	143,894
And, by deducting 10 per cent. for absentees, the actual number of legal voters exercising that right in 1868, was	129,504
The total number of votes registered in the city of New York was (see table 4)	170,222
The total number of votes cast by wards and districts (table 5) was	156,050
And it thus appears that the number of votes cast exceeded the total voting population as shown by the census	12,156
That it exceeded the actual voters, as shown by deducting 10 per cent. for absentees	26,546
And that the number of voters registered exceeded the total number of persons entitled to vote by	26,328

Showing a nearly equal number of illegal votes and of illegal registries.

The statistics of the separate wards of the city show where this increase of illegal voting is to be found, as for instance in the Sixth ward. The voting population by the census of 1865—native, 399; foreign, 3,546; total	4,145

Increased by 4 per cent. per annum, it would be, in 1868	4,642
The number of votes registered in 1868 was	5,686
The number of votes officially reported as cast was	5,401
Being an excess in the registry of	1,044
An excess of votes cast over the total number of voters of	759
And over the 90 per cent. who vote of	1,223

But in this case it is an ascertained fact that the male population of the Sixth ward, which in 1860 was 13,465, and which in 1865 had diminished to 9,717, a loss of 3,748, has, since 1865, diminished still further, from dwellings giving place to stores and factories, which makes the fraudulent excess in registry and votes cast much larger than in the above estimate, in which an increase is allowed of 4 per cent. per annum.

A similar examination of the statistics of other wards in the down-town districts, where the foreign and floating element is large, shows still greater discrepancies between the number of votes, as shown by the census, and the votes officially reported.

Passing from the vote of the city to that of the State, it is found that in the counties containing large cities, such as Kings, Albany, Rensselaer, and Erie, and along the line of the Hudson River there is an increase of votes much larger than was ever before given. Heretofore 90 per cent. has been the extreme limit of the votes cast compared with the total voting population. In Kings County it is 102 per cent. In Delaware nearly 101 per cent., with a similar increase, although not so large in Rockland, Orange, Broome, Ulster, and other counties along the line of the Erie Railroad.

II.—AS TO THE MANNER IN WHICH THE FRAUD WAS PERPETRATED.

1. The naturalization of aliens in the city of New York during the present year has been conducted in the court of common pleas, the superior court, and the supreme court.

In the court of common pleas, where the law seems to have been faithfully executed and the records are properly kept, the records show a total of twenty-nine hundred and seventy-eight certificates of citizenship issued from June 10 to the 25th of October.

In the supreme court the books are said not to be written up nor the records arranged, and the clerk has refused, after advisement, as is believed, by a judge of the court, to allow the records to be submitted to examination.

In the supreme court, one of the judges holding the circuit and over and terminer, sat also in October for some twenty days for the purpose of naturalizing aliens, and his sessions for this purpose frequently continued until late at night. During the progress of the work it is believed that no record whatever was kept, but that the original papers were bundled up and sent to the clerk's office, where they are now being slowly arranged.

The proceedings were conducted in a manner but little calculated to inspire respect for the discretion of the court and the supremacy of the law or the dignity of American citizenship. Roughs and bullies were admitted, to the exclusion of respectable citizens. Newspaper reporters, who attended to report the proceedings, were ejected, and a member of the bar was forcibly turned out. Numbers of applicants for naturalization were vouched for by the same witnesses; and there is reason to believe that gangs of men were repeatedly passed before the judge under the assumed names of aliens for whom naturalization papers were desired, but who were unable or unwilling to take the necessary oaths.

The number thus naturalized in the supreme court, fairly or fraudulently, is variously estimated from 20,000 to 50,000. Irregular and illegal naturalization is believed to have occurred also in other parts of the State. In Ulster County a county judge is reported to have opened court every morning at the clerk's office, and to have left the clerk to issue certificates of citizenship to parties whom he had never seen nor examined. The number of certificates thus issued is stated at over 600. In Troy a justice of the peace, with no jurisdiction in the matter, assumed to act, and 1,700 pretended certicates are believed to have been issued. The clerk of the court is reported to have admitted that the names were entered by him in the court records some weeks after the papers were issued, from recollection. A similar issue of pretended papers, although less in number, is reported as having occurred in Greene County, and like irregularities in other counties of the State.

III.—FRAUDULENT MANUFACTURE, SALE, AND DISTRIBUTION OF PRETENDED CERTIFICATES.

From the preliminary proceedings in the case of Rosenberg, now under indictment in the United States district court, it appeared that the accused had acknowledged having himself furnished 7,000 certificates of citizenship, and that he had offered to furnish 5,000 to the witness on condition that they should not be used by republicans. The trial of Rosenberg is suspended until the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States upon questions of law raised by the defendant, upon which Judges Nelson and Blatchford divided in opinion, and it is believed that upon the decision in this case depends also the finding of some thirty other indictments against other parties for naturalization and election frauds.

Until these questions shall be decided all proceedings under the law of the United States are stayed.

The undersigned are advised and charge that these fraudulent papers were supplied in large numbers from the city of New York to the workmen in the manufactories in the interior of the State; among other cases to three hundred workmen at the West Point foundery, who had not left their work, and to gangs of workmen at Verplank's, America, and other places; and that they were furnished on order, in any name and for any part of the State; that they were offered wholesale at $1.50 apiece, and at retail at $2, and that they were subsequently hawked about in blank, at prices descending to twenty-five cents, and pressed gratuitously upon aliens not entitled to be naturalized and who neither asked for nor wanted them.

IV.—FRAUDULENT REGISTRATION.

Proofs are in hand showing that a large number of names, real and fictitious, have been fraudulently entered upon the registries with false residences attached thereto.

This particular fraud has been perpetrated with a boldness, system, and success which, until the rights of citizens are more perfectly protected by the Legislature and the judiciary, will render the preservation of the purity of the franchise a task impossible.

The ascertainment of frauds of this sort is a work of time and labor which the undersigned have but partially accomplished. One or two extracts from the returns made by examiners in certain localities will show their character:

5. Repeating, by individuals, and gangs of men who, with a flimsy attempt at disguise, occasionally exchanged coats and hats, and who voted a second and third time at the same poll, being furnished by a person in attendance at the polls with a list of names from the registry of those who had not yet voted, and who continued this system of repeating in other voting districts.

6. Terrorism and violence on the day of election were resorted to to prevent the challenging of illegal votes, and two republican inspectors were improperly arrested, one of them by a bogus warrant issued by two of his co-inspectors and served while he was performing his official duties at the poll, from which he was dragged to prison.

7. To the proclamation of Mayor Hoffman the attention of your honorable bodies is specially directed, as having afforded official encouragement to those engaged in the attempt to influence the election by the use of certificates, genuine in appearance but void in fact; by assailing the officers of the United States and its grand jury as having attempted to interfere with the freedom of election in the Empire State; by complaining that the authority of the judges and the seal of the supreme court of the State were defied, and by denouncing those who were attempting to protect the purity of the franchise as designing and wicked men.

The proclamation was as follows:

"PROCLAMATION.

"MAYOR'S OFFICE,
"New York, October 31, 1868.

"To the people of the city of New York:

"We are on the eve of an important election. Intense excitement pervades the whole community. Unscrupulous, designing, and dangerous men, political partisans, are resorting to extraordinary means to increase it. Gross and unfounded charges of fraud are made by them against those high in authority. Threats are made against naturalized citizens, and the authority of the judges and the seal of the supreme court is defied. A grand jury of the United States court, summoned through the agency of those who are in this scheme, has, as I have been informed, been induced, without that preliminary examination which is usual, and which is afforded by law for the protection of character, to find in great haste and secrecy bills of indictment against divers persons for the purpose, openly avowed, of intimidating them in the discharge of their public duties. The United States marshal, a violent political partisan, has assumed to himself the power and duty of appointing swarms of special deputies to take their place at the polls, and to threaten and awe the electors of the State of New York in the exercise of their high privilege of casting their votes for the chief officers of the nation and State. It is the first time in the history of the country that United States Government officials have attempted to interfere with free elections in the Empire State, and the act is attended with danger.

"Evidence is accumulating that the combination of dangerous men who have set on foot and thus far carried into execution these unusual and unjustifiable movements have done so for two purposes:

"First. To conceal and cover their own schemes of fraud, which they hope to consummate by the aid of untried or pardoned criminals.

"Second. So to excite the masses of people in this city, who are opposed to them, as to lead them into acts of disorder and violent resistance.

"In the exercise of my duty as chief magistrate of this city, I call upon all good people to unite in preventing the consummation of this scheme. Let them watch carefully the movements of those who seek to perpetrate great frauds, while they charge frauds upon others, and above all things let them see to it that there shall be no scenes of violence or disorder on the day of election. Perfect peace and order are essential to the welfare of the city and prosperity of the State, and the maintenance of the rights of the people.

"Nothing but evil and calamity can come from any disturbance of the public peace. Those in authority and those out of it alike find their protection in the maintenance of law and the preservation of order.

"Let no citizen, however, be deterred by any threats or fears from the discharge of his duty at the polls or elsewhere, but let him assert his rights boldly, resolutely, and at the same time with calmness and dignity, and he will find his perfect protection under the laws and lawfully constituted authorities of the State of New York.

"By virtue of authority vested in me by law, I hereby offer a reward of $100, to be paid on the arrest and conviction of any person charged with a violation of the election laws of this State, and a like sum to be paid on the arrest and conviction of any person charged with intimidating, obstructing, or defrauding any voter in the exercise of his right as an elector.

"In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and official seal, at the city hall, in the city of New York, this 31st day of October, 1868.

"JOHN T. HOFFMAN, Mayor."

This document, singular in its disregard of official courtesy and propriety, was calculated to bring into discredit and contempt United States officials for their efforts to preserve the purity of the franchise, and tended to neutralize the effect of the judicious charge of Judge Benedict on the naturalization frauds; to induce unqualified aliens to believe that they had a right to use certificates duly signed and sealed, without regard to the manner in which they were obtained; and to deter honest citizens and inspectors of elections from individual attempts to check by challenge illegal votes, which were thus virtually encouraged, while those who were honestly endeavoring to protect the franchise were officially denounced as wishing to cover their own schemes of fraud.

The attention of your honorable bodies is asked also to the following circular throwing light upon the tactics of the party or the faction by which the fraudulent conspiracy had been organized to change the vote of the State.

It is perhaps proper to say that Mr. Tilden, whose name is subscribed to it, has publicly denied that he authorized it; but the undersigned have evidence to show that the circular did come from the rooms of the democratic State committee; that they have reason to believe that arrangements were made in accordance with the provision of the said circular for the transmission of telegrams; that telegrams were received from the rural districts with estimates of the vote, addressed to William M. Tweed, Tammany Hall, as therein directed; that the election returns in the city were in many cases kept back until a later hour than usual on the night of the election; that the democratic inspector in one case declared he was ordered to keep them back; that in some districts the police were compelled to appoint new canvassers on account of the refusal of the democratic canvassers to properly and promptly proceed with the canvassing; and that when the returns were made in many districts at a late hour the next morning the vote was, as already stated, largely in excess of the legal voters, and in some districts in excess also of the votes registered.

The circular was as follows:

[Private and strictly confidential.]

"ROOMS OF THE DEMOCRATIC STATE COMMITTEE,
"October 27, 1868.

"MY DEAR SIR: Please at once to communicate with some reliable person, in three or four principal towns and in each city of your county, and request him (expenses duly arranged for this end) to telegraph to William M. Tweed, Tammany Hall, at the minute of closing the polls, not waiting for the count, such person's estimate of the vote.

"Let the telegraph be as follows:

"'This town will show a democratic gain (or loss) over last year of (number;)' or this one if sufficiently certain: 'This town will give a republican (or democratic) majority of ——.'

"There is of course an important object to be attained by a simultaneous transmission at the hour of closing the polls, but not longer waiting. Opportunity can be taken of the usual half-hour lull in telegraphic communications over lines before actual results begin to be declared and before the Associated Press absorb the telegraph with returns and interfere with individual messages; and give orders to watch carefully the count.

"Very truly, yours,

"SAMUEL J. TILDEN,
"Chairman."

Upon the foregoing statistical returns, facts, and statements the undersigned respectfully submit—

That they indicate the existence of a conspiracy which certain circumstances connected with the issue of certificates and the release on habeas corpus of persons arrested for false registering and illegal voting would seem to indicate was initiated and carried on with the cognizance and connivance of local judges and other court officials; that the conspiracy had its agents and emissaries in various parts of the State of New York, and was intended to carry the recent presidential and State elections by fraud: first, by the issue of fraudulent naturalization papers on a gigantic scale, to which encouragement was virtually given by the official proclamation of the mayor; then by fraudulent registration and fraudulent repeating; and lastly by a circular, secret and strictly confidential, dated at the rooms of the democratic State committee, which, unexplained, seems to indicate that its authors had then abettors and tools in every county, city, and town of the State, who were to aid them by discovering at the last moment after the polls were closed and before the count was had what additional fraud in the shape of a false count in the city of New York might still be necessary to enable them to attain the important object of defeating the will of the people of the State as expressed by their legal votes, and securing the return of the candidates in whose interest the conspiracy had been planned and executed.

That by carefully compiled comparative statistics it is demonstrated that the victory thus achieved was won by illegal votes which could by no possibility have been honestly cast; that in this manner the will of the people of the State of New York has been fraudulently and violently overruled in reference to the electoral ticket, as well as in regard to their own State officers.

That the existing naturalization laws of the United States have proven insufficient to preserve the system of naturalization from abuse by gross irregularities and fraud; that some of the State courts empowered to confer citizenship, with its weighty rights and privileges, the right to exercise the suffrage, the right to hold property, and the right the world over to claim the protection of the flag, have imperfectly and improperly exercised the powers thus given, and that pending the decision in the Rosenberg case there is no law by which such irregularities and frauds can be detected and punished; that the disclosure of such an organized conspiracy in this city to change the result of the State and presidential election exhibits a state of things fraught with danger to the whole body-politic, and demands the serious and earnest attention of Congress and the wise exercise of the power conferred upon it by the Constitution to make and alter the time, place, and manner of electing members of the House of Representatives.

That properly to legislate for the prevention and correction of the existing evils in New York and other large cities it is essential that Congress should be correctly advised in regard to their character and extent, and that, inasmuch as officers of local courts are implicated in the matter of the naturalization fraud, and the district court of the United States is temporarily, at least, without jurisdiction, pending the decision of the Supreme Court, there is no other way in which Congress can properly advise itself on the subject than by appointing a committee of investigation with power to send for persons and papers, and to report the facts fully and fairly, without fear or favor, as well in regard to the frauds herein charged as in regard to that scheme of fraud which Mayor Hoffman officially proclaimed that his opponents hoped to consummate by the aid of untried or pardoned criminals, and that scheme of violence into which he officially charged that they hoped to excite the masses of the people.

It is clear that whenever good faith and honor are discarded by party managers, and fraud is deliberately resorted to as a weapon of party warfare, and that fraud becomes successful, and is installed in power, and clothed with official dignity, none but the supreme authority can prevent its future domination and restore to the people confidence in their institutions.

Unaided in investigations by the judiciary of the city or of the nation, deeming it hopeless by individual effort to gather such legal proofs as might be necessary to place in their seats the men whom we believe were fairly elected by the votes of the people of the State of New York, we appeal to your honorable bodies for protection in the future.

Were it once established that a faction which by fraud has triumphed over the people is to enjoy with impunity its ill-gotten victory, it would, of course proceed to perpetuate its power by further frauds and wicked usurpations, while honest citizens of both parties would protest by withdrawing from the polls where popular elections had become a sham. In such a case our elections, no longer the source of noble debate on great principles or generous rivalry on public interests, would degenerate into mere contests for place, power, and profit. Unprincipled politicians, like reckless gamesters, would seek by secret fraud and open violence to accomplish the most unjust and ignoble of purposes; justice would become a matter of purchase, and an elective judiciary the leaders of the conspiracy.

In addition to the necessity and importance of the most searching scrutiny into the conduct of the last election for the advisement of Congress in regard to the legislation proper to correct those abuses and wisely to determine the manner in which members of Congress should be elected, the appointment of a committee of investigation will be hailed with satisfaction by honest men of all parties as a means of discovering the mass of frauds which have been committed, especially in reference to the electoral vote, and as indicating the proper legislation by which the purity of the franchise and the safety of the nation may be henceforth preserved. Such an investigation will be hailed alike by the republicans whom Mayor Hoffman arraigned and by the honest democrats who may have repudiated with scorn the fraudulent proceedings of their associates, and who may be able to show that they used their best endeavors to defeat, expose, and punish the villainies that have been perpetrated in the interest of their party.

We therefore pray Congress to appoint a special committee, with power to send for persons and papers, to investigate the naturalization and election frauds and irregularities perpetrated in the recent election in the city and State of New York, with a view to the thorough advisement of Congress in reference to the evils in connection therewith, requiring to be remedied by national legislation in pursuance of the national Constitution; and your petitioners will ever pray.

NEW YORK, December 8, 1868.

The high character of the gentlemen whose names are subscribed to this petition and the startling information conveyed therein induced Congress to make the investigation asked for, and from the report of the committee I desire to submit the following extracts:

These frauds are so varied in character that they comprehend every known crime against the elective franchise. They corrupted the administration of justice, degraded the judiciary, defeated the execution of the laws, subverted, for the time being in New York State the essential principles of popular government, robbed the people of that great State of their rightful choice of electors of President and Vice-President, of a governor and other officers, disgraced the most populous city of the Union, encouraged the enemies of republican government here and everywhere to deride our institutions as a failure, and endangered the peace of the Republic by an attempt to defeat the will of the people in the choice of their rulers. The events of the past year in New York and the evidence taken by the committee furnish the proof of all these allegations. Among the most prominent of the frauds committed in the interest of the democratic party in the city and State of New York in connection with the election in November, 1868, are these:

1. Many thousands of aliens fraudulently procured or were furnished with certificates of naturalization illegally or fraudulently issued, by means of which they were enabled to register as voters, and voted in violation of law.

2. Many hundreds of certificates of naturalization were granted in the names of fictitious persons to be used by native-born and naturalized citizens and aliens in falsely registering as voters, and to enable them to vote many times at the elections.

3. Many hundreds of persons voted in New York City from two to forty times or more, each under assumed or fictitious names, fraudulently registered for the purpose.

4. Extensive frauds were committed in canvassing tickets, and names of voters were entered on the poll lists, and democratic tickets counted as if voters representing them voted, when no such persons voted at all.

5. To accomplish these frauds, gross neglect of duty and disregard of law, so great as to evince a criminal purpose, prevailed in some of the courts, while officers and democratic partisans of almost every grade, either by official influence or otherwise, aided, sanctioned, or knew of and failed to prevent them. The same influences shielded the perpetrators, in nearly all cases, from detection or arrest; and when arrested, they have, through the agency of judicial officers and others charged with the duty of prosecution, escaped all punishment.

6. Through these agencies, the democratic electors of President and Vice-President and the democratic candidate for governor of the State of New York were fraudulently elected.

7. And the investigations of the committee show that existing State laws and the mode of enforcing them are wholly inadequate to prevent these frauds, but that Congress has the power to enact laws which, if faithfully executed, will, to some extent, furnish remedies hereafter. There is no law of Congress professing to prevent or punish frauds in voting or conducting elections; and the penalties relating to certificates of naturalization are by no means adequate. (Chapter 1, pages 4 and 5.)

Prior to the year 1868 naturalizations were effected in State courts in New York City only in the court of common pleas and the superior court. The average number naturalized each year in the common pleas, from 1856 to 1867, inclusive, was 5,252, and in the superior court 3,955, or a total annual average of 9,207. The highest number in any one of these years, in both these courts, prior to 1865, was 16,493, in 1856. On the 6th of October, 1868, the supreme court commenced the work of naturalization. In the year 1868 these courts, as reported by some of their officers, naturalized as follows:

In the common pleas	3,145
Superior court	27,897
Supreme court, in October	10,070
Total	41,112

This is more than four times the average of previous years, and about two and a half times greater than the largest number in any preceding year; and it is not possible that there could have been any such number of legal applications. (Chapter 2, pages 5, 6, and 7.)

There is a large class of fraudulent certificates issued to aliens who not only never appeared in court, but who never asked that application should be made for them. They were left at houses, stores, and other places, or sold or given away. Individual instances are numerous. (P. 17.)

Among the frauds practiced under the naturalization laws were the false personation of applicants for naturalization, perjury of witnesses under real and assumed names, the fabrication of applications for naturalization and oaths in support of them, with names of applicants and witnesses forged; the granting of certificates of naturalization in fictitious names, and an application regular in form, but without the presence of any applicants, and to persons not entitled to them. To accomplish these it was necessary to secure the active co-operation of some of the courts, or their passive acquiescence or negligence so gross as to raise an irresistible presumption of fraudulent participation. (P. 21.)

The actual number of illegal, fraudulent, and fictitious naturalizations never can be known, but, including those sent from New York City over the State to persons never appearing in court, it is probably safe to say that fraudulent certificates were issued from these two courts alone as follows:

Fraudulent minor applications, as shown above		6,656
Highest number of prior naturalizations since 1855	16,493
Number as reported in 1868	41,112
Difference—estimated fraudulent		24,619
Of the 27,068 missing blank certificates in the supreme court, it would doubtless be safe to assume, on the evidence, that there have been used		27,068
In the counties of Ulster, Monroe, Westchester, Renssalaer, Putnam, Green, and Orange, estimating what is probable from what is proved		5,000
As the evidence shows a widespread conspiracy, it is safe to estimate for other portions of the State		5,000
Or a total of not less, and probably more, than		68,343

(Page 31.)

There is evidence to show that it was a part of the gigantic scheme of carrying the democratic ticket in the State of New York by fraud to delay the canvassing of the vote in the city of New York until the result in the counties of the State should be known, and then make up any deficiency not supplied by repeating and other fraudulent voting, by stuffing the ballot-boxes. (Pages 47 and 48.)

No democratic official, officer of justice, or politician took any measures to defeat or prevent these frauds, but they did take measures to aid them and to obstruct the purposes of those who attempted in vain to defeat them. To make these means successful, the necessary agencies were employed to prevent detection as far as possible, and to defeat the purposes of those who would expose or interfere with the execution of these fraudulent schemes. (P. 54.)

The percentage of increase from 1864 to 1868, as indicated by the enormously large vote of the latter, was 41.1 per cent., or more than twice as much as the average percentage of increase of previous presidential elections. (P. 62.)

In view of all the facts, it is safe to estimate that the total fraudulent and illegal votes cast in the State of New York at the election in November, 1868, were not less, and probably exceed 50,000 votes.

As the result of the work of this committee, the law which you now seek to repeal was enacted. It cannot be embraced in the category of "war measures," which "were born of the passions incident to civil strife." It was enacted not as a rider upon an appropriation bill, but as an independent measure made necessary by the great frauds committed by the democratic party in the State of New York, and here is the law as it was passed:

SEC. 2002. No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control, any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States, or to keep the peace at the polls.

This brief statute, made necessary by the democratic party, is the occasion of this extra session of Congress and the mischief it is creating.

The reasons are obvious. At the election of 1868, as we have seen, the democratic party secured the electoral vote of the State of New York and elected its State ticket. At the election in the same State in 1872 there was a fair and honest election, which was secured by the provisions of this law, and the result was a majority for the whole republican ticket of more than fifty thousand votes.

Next I give the letter of the democratic candidate for President in 1872, Horace Greeley, to the democratic candidate for the same high office in 1876, Samuel J. Tilden, which ought to be good authority with every honest democrat in the country:

SIR: You and I are growing old. We came here young men from the country, and have lived and struggled side by side for nearly forty years. We have participated ardently in many political struggles, always on different sides. You were the pupil of Van Buren and Silas Wright; I a disciple and follower of Henry Clay. But this I will say for you, that I am confident you have never sought to enrich yourself by politics or at the expense of the public; that whatever of wealth you may have acquired or enjoyed was earned in your profession as a lawyer; and that your instincts and your influences, partisanship apart, have generally been felt on the side of economy in public expenditure and uprightness in the conduct of public affairs. Of my course in these respects you are welcome to say whatever you think true.

On one very important point, however, your bitterness as a partisan has impelled you to ignore and come short of your duty as a citizen and a professed upholder of government by the people; and for this dereliction I here arraign you. I allude to the preservation of the purity of the ballot-box.

You and I grew up in the country, and are familiar with elections as there conducted. We both know that, except in a few districts where the voters are all on one side, it is morally impossible that any considerable proportion of fraudulent votes should there be polled; for those who attend a poll are nearly all well known to each other, and hardly ever is one entitled to vote who is not known to be so to men of each party. If one should offer a vote who is not so known, he is challenged and questioned of course, and his answers will convict him if a bogus voter. I do not believe that the illegal vote in the rural districts was ever 1 per cent. of the whole number polled, even when there was no registration of legal voters.

How different is the case in cities, and especially in this Babel, you very well know. Long as you have lived on Gramercy Park, and eminent in social position and fortune as are the inhabitants of that favored locality, you could not tell within twenty which of the residents in sight of your front door are and which are not entitled to vote; you could not make a list of the legal voters residing on that square which would even approach accuracy. How it must be then with the nomadic denizens of our "back slums" and of our great tenement houses; how utterly impossible it is that any one should know which among them are and which are not legal voters, and whether the man who offers to vote at eleven a. m. at one poll has not already voted several times at different polls, and whether he is or is not on his way to vote still oftener at other polls, you cannot help knowing if you would. I can imagine how a man may shut his eyes to many things which he deems it convenient not to know, but I speak of what you must know, however you may wish or seek to be ignorant of it.

The matter to which I call your attention is vital to the very existence of free popular government. Whenever it shall be generally understood that the results of the elections are not determined by the ballots of legal voters, but by frauds in voting or frauds in counting, then the advent of avowed, unequivocal despotism must be near at hand. Between the rule of an emperor and the rule of a clique of ballot-box stuffers, every intelligent man must prefer the former as less rapacious and more responsible. When honest citizens shall avoid the polls, asking "What is the use of voting? the result is already fixed," the days of the Republic will be numbered. Between a ruler who prohibits voting altogether and the gang who make it a sham by filling the ballot-boxes with illegal votes, or miscounting those actually cast, the sway of the former is every way preferable.

Mr. Tilden, I have been voting here for thirty-seven years, and an active politician for more than thirty of them, and I appeal to God for my sincerity and to my public record for a witness that in all those years I have earnestly sought and labored to have our elections decided by legal votes and none other. Seeing how great are the temptations and the facilities, under a right of suffrage so general as ours, to poll illegal votes, I have openly and actively favored every effort to shut them out and keep the suffrage pure and legal. That every legal voter should have a full and fair opportunity to vote once at each election; that no one should be enabled to vote more than once, and that none but legal voters should be allowed or empowered to vote at all; such has been my constant aim. I have not confined myself to barren professions, but have shown my faith by my works.

How is it with you? You hold a most responsible and influential position in the councils of a great party. You could make that party content itself with polling legal votes if you only would. In our late constitutional convention I tried to erect some fresh barrier against election frauds. Did you? The very little that I was enabled to effect in this direction I shall try to have ratified by the people at our ensuing election. Will you?

Mr. Tilden, you cannot escape responsibility by saying, with the guilty Macbeth—

> "Thou canst not say I did it; never shake
> Those gory locks at me!"

for you were at least a passive accomplice in the giant frauds of last November. Your name was used, without public protest on your part, in circulars sowed broadcast over the State, whereof the manifest intent was to "make assurance double sure" that the frauds here perpetrated should not be overborne by the honest vote of the rural district. And you, not merely by silence, but by positive assumption, have covered those frauds with the mantle of your respectability. On the principle that "the receiver is as bad as the thief" you are as deeply implicated in them to-day as though your name was Tweed, O'Brien, or Okey Hall.

Mr. Tilden, you and I were ardent participants in the struggle of 1840, wherein Martin Van Buren was ousted from the Presidency by General Harrison. You know how thoroughly our city was absorbed in that contest, wherein every man, woman, and child took a deep and lively interest. Our elections were then held throughout three days; there was a registration freshly enacted which blacklegs had not yet learned to circumvent; the right of suffrage was as widely diffused as it now is; no one ever complained that a single legal voter was unable then to poll his vote. And, though our city has since largely increased its population, the lower wards were quite as populous then as they are to-day—several of them more so. They were full of boarding-houses crowded with clerks and mechanics. Many of these covered sites since given up to great warehouses and manufactories, their denizens have moved up-town, over to Brooklyn, or out on some of the railroads that lead out into the open country. Practically, the lower wards are being given up to commerce, and no longer shelter by night the multitudes who throng their streets by day.

Now look at the vote of four of these wards in 1840 and 1868, respectively:

Wards.	President, 1840.		Governor, 1868.
	Harrison.	Van Buren.	Griswold.	Hoffman.
Fourth ward	1,138	1,177	480	3,820
Sixth ward	806	1,223	369	5,032
Seventh ward	1,707	1,728	1,265	6,895
Fourteenth ward	1,142	1,393	726	4,526
Four wards	4,793	5,521	2,840	20,283

Van Buren's majority, 728; Hoffman's majority, 17,443.

Mr. Tilden, you know what this contrast attests. Right well do you comprehend the means whereby the vote of 1868 was thus swelled out of all proportions. There are not twelve thousand legal voters living in those wards to-day, though they gave Hoffman 17,443 majority. Had the day been of average length, it would doubtless have been swelled to at least twenty thousand. There was nothing but time needed to make it one hundred thousand, if so many had been wanted and paid for.

Now, Mr. Tilden, I call on you to put a stop to this business. You have but to walk into the sheriff's, the mayor's, and the supervisors' offices in the City Hall Park, and say there must be no more of it—say it so there shall be no doubt that you mean it—and we shall have a tolerably fair election once more. Probably a good part of the fifty thousand supplied last fall with bogus naturalization certificates will offer to register and to vote—some of them pretending not to know that they are no more citizens of the United States than the King of Dahomey is—but very few will vote repeatedly unless paid for it; and we shall not be cheated more than ten thousand if you simply tell the boss workmen that there must be no illegal voting instigated and paid for.

Will you do it? Your reputation is at stake. The cowardly craft which > "Would not play false,

> And yet would wrongly win," will not avail. If we republicans are swindled as we were swindled last fall, you, and such as you, will be responsible to God and man for the outrage. Prosecutors, magistrates, municipal authorities, are all in the pool; we have nothing to hope from the ministers of justice and the villains have no fear of the terrors of the law. I appeal to you and anxiously await the result.

Yours,

HORACE GREELEY.

NEW YORK, October 20, 1869.

TO SAMUEL J. TILDEN,
Chairman Democratic State Committee.

Gentlemen of the majority, you have been too generously and magnanimously treated by the republican party and the Government. You have presumed a great deal, but you have now, as you did in 1861, gone a step too far. Your purposes are transparent and would have been understood, if you had not so boldly stripped off the thin gauze of patriotic pretension that had partially concealed them. You mean to elect your candidate for President next year by fraud, as you elected a majority of the Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, and Forty-sixth Congresses, and as you attempted to elect your nominee for the Presidency in 1876. You committed outrages at these elections which are a disgrace to the civilization of the age and that will remain for all time a blot on the American name. Men of forecast do not believe you can elect either a President or a majority of Congress in 1880 with a fair vote and an honest count. There is, then, no hope of success on your part unless you can get rid of United States supervisors and soldiers. They must be banished from the polls, or your cause must perish and you be remanded to private life.

Let me give you the condition of one congressional district, the fifth South Carolina, as reported to me by Hon. Robert Smalls. As he stated, there were, by the census of 1875, 25,000 colored and 11,000 white voters in that district. Mr. Smalls was elected in that district to the Forty-fourth and Forty-fifth Congresses, and he was a candidate for re-election in November, 1878, and, as he believes, had a majority of 8,000 on a fair count, but the democratic candidate was declared elected by a majority of 15,745. At one polling precinct 682 ballots were cast for him by that number of colored voters; the record of their voting was so kept there could be no doubt of that fact; yet when the returns were made not one vote was returned as having been given for him. The box was stuffed with tissue ballots on which was the name of his opponent, and in drawing the excess from the box till the number left corresponded with the poll-list the republican ballots could be distinguished by the touch from the tissue ballots, so that the man, blindfolded according to law, drew out all but the tissue ballots and left Mr. Smalls without a single vote. With supervisors at the polling places to discover and point out such practices, and loyal Union soldiers within convenient access to secure enforcement of the laws against the guilty violators, there would be an end to democratic majorities, and here is the true inwardness of your objections to supervisors and soldiers.

The time has come when there should be reconciliation, full, thorough, and complete. But it should begin at the loyal, Union-loving end of the line this time. Something is due and should at least be demanded, insisted upon, and received by this side. The maimed, decrepit soldier and his dependent family, the sorrowing widow, and the fatherless children, the childless parent, made so by you and your party, are entitled to be consulted. The derangement of the entire business interests of the country, for which you alone are responsible, the burden of a grievous public debt, oppressing all classes, created by you—all these interests you should satisfy and be required to obtain their sanction of your worthiness to administer the affairs of their Government, or you should be required to take back seats.

You promised to accept the results of the war in good faith, that you would respect the amendments to the Constitution and help to execute the laws, and that you would see that every citizen, white and black, had all the privileges you claimed for yourselves. These assurances were so strongly given by you to an honest, hopeful, and confiding administration that it generously trusted you, and in accordance with such mutual understanding the troops of the United States, which have been so offensive to you since 1861, were withdrawn from your States, and you were left, as you desired to be, to control your own affairs as fully as though you had never forfeited your right to do so; but you have been as unfaithful to the Government and to the pledges upon which it consented to trust you as you were during the rebellion.

If it had been conceived at the most important period of the struggle that a score of rebel brigadiers would be members of the United States Senate to-day, and that that branch of Congress and this also would be controlled by them and their abettors, it would have been, in my judgment, difficult, if not impossible, to have kept men enough in our Army to capture the rebel capital. But this contempt cast upon the loyal soldiers who saved the Union on the bloody fields of conflict is but the foreshadowing of what is to come if your schemes to get possession of the Government in all its branches are successful. We have already seen the attempt made to reduce the Army in numbers until it could offer little resistance to an armed conspiracy organized to overpower the officers of the law. We have also seen a purpose to stop promotions, no matter how just and proper. No considerate observer of events can doubt that if these men once get full control the Army would soon be largely increased in numbers and rebel generals would succeed to its command. If such are not your purposes why this extra session of Congress? The agitation which you have caused here is detrimental to every interest of the country. No prudent man dare enlarge his business or engage in enterprises that would employ labor and capital. Hence you are criminally postponing the time when universal prosperity shall again gladden the hearts and households of the land.

You lost the election in 1860, and purposely that you might use it as a pretext to reconcile your own section to your scheme of breaking up the Union. After going through with a ceremony which you called secession in several of your States, your sympathizers and abettors sought to assassinate the constitutionally elected President, Abraham Lincoln, while he was on his way from his western home to this capital to enter upon the discharge of his official duties. You threatened, through your accredited leader, Wigfall, in the other end of the Capitol, that if the Government sent its flag, with thirty-four stars upon its folds, at the mast-head of its ships, with provisions to feed its famishing soldiers quartered in Fort Sumter, Charleston Harbor, you would commence war on the Government you had often sworn to protect. Your attempt to starve the Government and the Army until they would become obedient to your unholy mandates is not new. It began more than eighteen years ago, and the provisions which you have ingrafted into this bill, vicious and revolutionary as they are, are in perfect harmony with your early and most approved methods of securing submission to your dictation. You did not starve the Army nor the Government into subjection then, and I do not apprehend that you will do so now.

When you fired on Fort Sumter you united all loyal men in the North, democrats and republicans, in the determination that the Union should be preserved regardless of cost in blood or treasure. I have no doubt you counted then as now on the idea that money must be had to perpetuate the Union, and that it could not be provided. But you did not properly estimate the united determination and ability of the free, self-reliant North. A bill was drawn appropriating $3,000,000 by the Legislature of the State of New York as soon as it could be perfected after the news reached Albany that the gallant Anderson's forces had been attacked. It was a voluntary loan to aid the Government to preserve itself against all enemies. I had the honor and the privilege of participating in that legislation; and I rejoice to say, if my memory is not at fault, that there were only six votes against the passage of the bill, and they were cast by New York city democrats, most of whom soon sadly regretted their mistake. The seventy-five thousand volunteer troops asked for by President Lincoln were forthcoming, and men and money were freely tendered faster than the men could be equipped or armed. The governor was importuned to authorize the organizing of companies and regiments and to permit them to drill and fit themselves for active service, and to enter upon it as soon as the Government here would accept them, and he complied with such requests.

The loyal States vied with each other in their efforts to see which could contribute the most and do their work best. Your friends could and did murder some of Massachusetts' best men in the streets of Baltimore when its first regiment was on the way to this capital in compliance with its duty. You could sacrifice the lives of more than a million of industrious citizens, perpetrate the sickening horrors and barbarities of Andersonville and Libby, clothe nearly every household in the loyal States with sadness and mourning, and add, as you did, all the miseries and sufferings that are a part of and attach to such a condition of affairs. Your earnest sympathizer and friend, whose life and character were the natural outgrowth of your institutions, statesmanship, and inspirations, John Wilkes Booth, could and did assassinate as good a man as ever lived and as good a President as Washington, Jefferson, or Jackson. Yet you could not, with all this, starve the Army nor destroy the Union of the States.

You may continue to carry elections in the northern cities and States in the future, as you have in the past, by perjury, ballot-box stuffing, and false counts, and in the South by rifle-clubs, red-shirts, white-liners, assassination, and murder. And after trying all these and still being defeated, you may try again to buy returning boards and electoral votes, invent and organize a machinery called an electoral commission in the hope of running it in your interest by artifice, and still find yourselves defeated. Then, when the candidates fairly elected are duly inaugurated, you may violate your pledges and agreement to abide by the result, and create investigating committees and attempt revolution by attacking titles that you have settled by your own legislation. You may do all this and more; you may continue to violate the Constitution and your own oaths of office by refusing to provide the means needed to feed and clothe the Army and for the support of the Government; yet, after you have done all this, I do not expect to see you succeed in starving the Government to death. The liberty-loving, loyal people of the North and West are as true now as they were in 1861-'65, and as able and ready to advance the means requisite to perpetuate the nation's life as they were before, and if you create the occasion they will do it. No, gentlemen, I cannot apprehend that you can by any possibility succeed in destroying the Government after you shall have done your utmost to accomplish it. My hope is that the God who presides over the destinies of nations as well as the affairs of individuals will again inspire the loyal citizens of the country to do their full duty now as He has in all the struggles of the past.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, representing as I do a constituency more directly interested in the results of this debate than those of most of my colleagues, I am impelled by a sense of duty to participate in it so far as to touch on a few points which, as it seems to me, my abler colleagues have passed over.

Reserving for the close of my remarks the vindication of my people from aspersions as unfounded as they are unjust, yet which have in part constituted the pretexts for the unconstitutional legislation which is now sought to be set aside by the amendments under consideration, I shall attempt briefly to disprove some of the assumptions and assertions of the advocates of that legislation on this floor. Two of these gentlemen, the member from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] and the member from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] in opening this discussion on the amendments to the Army bill, have displayed so much ingenuity in the defense of a bad cause as almost to "make the worse appear the better reason." Yet, though not boasting their persuasive powers, relying on the might and majesty of truth, I confidently appeal from their false doctrine and false presentation of facts to the judgment of an enlightened people in whatever section they may dwell. For, Mr. Chairman, I cannot regard these questions as sectional—though such an aspect has been given them—for they involve much larger and wider issues; involve, in fact, free suffrage and the perpetuation of constitutional liberty throughout the extent of this recently restored Union. To narrow the issue would be to give up to faction what was meant for mankind; to make ours a government of parties, not of the people, and turn this grave debate of ours into a mere partisan wrangle.

Recently restored, as we of the South have been, to a full participation in the administration of our common Government, we claim to be loyal to the Constitution, the great anchor of that Government, as any men from any section, and more than once recently have proved our inflexible determination to preserve in its pristine purity and vigor that Government which our fathers bequeathed us. The questions which have elicited the present grave debate strike at the very root of our institutions, at the Constitution; that Constitution which we have taken our solemn oaths to protect, preserve, and defend on taking our seats here. That document is the charter of my allegiance; not a new nation discovered or invented by latter-day politicians; nor that newer "sovereign" annointed by the member from Ohio, and crowned by his rhetoric with a more than kingly crown, "in whom resides the State's collected will," commonly termed mobocracy. For myself and those I represent, the written Constitution as framed by our fathers and amended by their successors with the assent of the States comprising this Union, is the only charter of our liberties, the only infallible guide for the conduct of our affairs, and hence I take exception to the broad proposition laid down by the gentleman from Ohio, that there is a higher court of appeal from that instrument to what he terms the sovereign power, the "people themselves."

It has been the fate of the present generation of American citizens to have been favored with many new doctrines, heresies, and schisms of a political character, commencing with that distant time when the great expounder of Massachusetts assailed, and the great expounder of South Carolina defended State-rights doctrine, followed by the proclamation of the new evangel of the higher law, which was above the Constitution, and the declaration of the transformation of a federation into a nation. But it has been reserved for the gentleman from Ohio to discover that we are living under a monarchy, although he has a right to claim—as first discoverer—this new sovereign of ours to whom our first and last allegiance is due. I quote his langnage:

> The sovereign of this nation, the God-crowned and heaven-annointed sovereign, in whom resides "the State's collected will," and to whom we all owe allegiance, is the people themselves. Inspired by love of country and by a deep sense of obligation to perform every public duty; being themselves the creators of all the agencies and forces to execute their own will, and choosing from themselves their Representatives to express that will in the forms of law, it would have been like a suggestion of suicide to assume that any of these great voluntary powers would be turned against the life of the Government. Public opinion—that great ocean of thought from whose level all heights and all depths are measured—was trusted as a power amply able, and always willing, to guard all the approaches on that side of the Constitution from any assault on the life of the nation.

To this exposition I oppose the sayings, doings, and written Constitution of the founders of our Government, the accredited expounders of our Constitution, the faith and practice of our Government and people to-day, each and all of which contradict the eloquent speaker. I appeal from his irresponsible "sovereign" to a government of law, which gusts of popular passion may shake but cannot overturn. I place my trust in a written charter instead of the wild utterances of the voice of the populace, which, although it may be the "voice of God," history proves may sometimes draw its inspiration from the opposite source. Why, Mr. Chairman, let any member of this body reflect for a moment on the oath he takes on being sworn into his seat and entering on his functions, and he will see where and how his allegiance is due and how far the shadowy sovereign evoked by the eloquent member can control our decision or our action.

No man respects or would readily defer to an enlightened public opinion lawfully expressed more than myself; but no man will more sternly repudiate and resist undue interference with respect to the powers delegated us in our legislative capacity.

Under our system of government, although the source and fountain of all authority be and must be the people, yet the instrument through which they must exercise that authority as certainly have been and must continue to be the constituted authorities, and having thus divested themselves of that original power, they can only collectively resume it by revolution. Such revolution might be peaceful, but the people who possess even that power are the people of the States, not the individuals composing the great mass of our population, else New York and a few other larger States in which the numerical majority reside might at any time revolutionize our whole system of government.

But the position taken by the gentleman in this regard contrasts strangely with the most authoritative exposition given by his party on a memorable occasion. I refer to the extreme State-rights doctrine expounded by the republican members on the presidential commission when they declared they could not go behind the returns covered by the broad seal of the State of Louisiana, although it was clearly proven that there was a forgery on the face of those electoral returns, that the present occupant of the Executive Mansion "was counted into office at most upon one hundred and eighty-three votes," and that "as to two electors at least there never was before the commission for consideration any vote from Louisiana at all."

Mr. Chairman, by every principle of justice, every rule of law, fraud vitiates and forgery annihilates all it touches. As forgery was apparent on the face of the Louisiana electoral certificates, it destroyed every muniment of title under it. Yet the startling spectacle is presented to the gaze of a free and enlightened people that the highest offices in this Republic have been conferred by fraud, sanctioned by forgery, and perpetuated by perjury and subornation of perjury; and, to consummate the infamy, he who holds by this tenure of office seeks to degrade citizens of my State because they refuse to condone the stupendous crime and bend the suppliant knee "that thrift may follow fawning," while he honors and rewards the forgers and perjurers who do.

The gentleman from Ohio, himself a member of the electoral commission, may hold that there is no appeal from its decision except to that sovereign power created by his lordly elocution, but which may have been proclaimed for an ulterior object, perhaps to inaugurate another President not elected by the people (in the legitimate exercise of their sovereign will) as well as to resist the proposed legislation now under consideration.

But the gentleman from Ohio charges that the course of the democratic party in demanding the repeal of certain measures which are mischievous and useless is revolutionary. He even has the boldness to give a ringing challenge to that effect in the following words:

> I am discussing a method of revolution against the Constitution now proposed in this House, and to that issue I hold gentlemen in this debate and challenge them to reply.

The gentleman's life-long affiliations and political associations certainly qualify him to speak authoritatively on "methods of revolution against the Constitution," for there are few which he and his party have not tried. He should, however, have looked nearer home for them than in the democratic party or even in this Congress. He need only look home, and look back to the very origin and birth of the party of which he is now the mouth-piece, to see that it owes its existence and its reign over this country for the last eighteen years to "methods of revolution against the Constitution" of the most reckless and audacious description.

The first "method of revolution against the Constitution" was devised by the old abolition party—the nest-egg from which the republican party was hatched—when it declared the Constitution of the United States to be "an agreement with death and a covenant with hell," and therefore to be utterly ignored and disregarded by all conscientious citizens. It was only after abolition had become an active element in politics that one of the master spirits of the new party devised a second "method of revolution against the Constitution" by softening this strong expression into the polite phrase of "a higher law" than the Constitution, preaching up under it the doctrine of "an irrepressible conflict" between the sections as a consequence of the conflict between the Constitution and the national conscience. These early "methods of revolution against the Constitution" were not even of native origin, but were foreign importations. They were first devised by British abolitionists, with whom Americans affiliated, and British gold was not spared, nor did British lecturers and emmissaries fail to be sent over to weaken a formidable rival by creating dissensions. These were the men who sowed the dragon's teeth which have since produced such a crop of armed men, and these the "methods of revolution" of the republican party in its childhood.

For many years after the adoption of this method its advocates, both native and foreign, were so odious and unpopular, even in the boasted "liberty-loving" region of New England, that they were pelted with rotten eggs whenever they made their appearance and treated as disturbers of the public peace.

When, however, such leaders as Mr. Seward and Mr. Chase joined this "forlorn hope" of fanatics and agitators this "method of revolution" gained strength and form. From a contemptible faction they became a party, and from a party, thanks to the fraternal strife of which they had sown the seeds, they gained absolute control of the Government.

When the clash of arms was over and the whole country subjected to one rule, the same party devised new "methods of revolution" to retain power which threatened to escape their grasp if the rule of constitutional law were resumed under the old methods. Slavery, which had been made a pretext for the war and a bid for northern and foreign sympathy, but which during the continuance of the conflict had been made a mere pawn in the game, was again used as a make-weight against the South, so as to perpetuate radical domination over that section.

Mr. Lincoln, who was the representative man of radicalism, plainly showed by his course the uses of this "new method," as well as the entire want of sympathy with the negro entertained by himself and his party after he had been made use of. Even Mr. Lincoln's boasted proclamation of emancipation does not really deserve that name, for he restricted it to southern territory not in Federal occupation, and true emancipation dates from the constitutional amendments ratified by the States after their passage through Congress. Mr. Lincoln showed his want of confidence and sympathy in the colored race yet more clearly in his proposal of their deportation from this country as unfit for the duties of citizenship and a standing source of embarrassment should they remain.

These are facts which history must record. The "new method," devised after Mr. Lincoln's death, of retaining radical possession of the Southern States through the colored vote, and the retention of radical control by exercising the right of suffrage for that end, never entered into Mr. Lincoln's calculations. That was reserved for his less sagacious successors to try, and the common sense of the liberated slave has frustrated that precious plan, to the rage and mortification of the plotters, who have strengthened, not weakened, the South thereby. Partially educated as the colored man yet is as to the duties of his new station, he has learned enough to distinguish his true from his false friends, his real from his alleged interest. Thus it happens that while the very men who forced suffrage and civil rights upon him would now, if they could, take them from him, I, in common with my people, since he has become free, do not regret his possession of the ballot, and will oppose all efforts to withdraw it from him.

This rapid and succinct statement of historical facts must convince all who have been dazzled by the glare of the Bengal lights in the oratory of the eloquent member from Ohio, that all the "methods of revolution against the Constitution" hitherto attempted have been devised and practiced by his own party, and do not lie at the doors of the democracy. His attempt thus to designate the repeal of obnoxious legislation, through a legislative method habitually practiced by his own party majority, until the scepter departed from them, must be regarded simply as an oratorical extravagance inspired by disappointment and desperation.

Terrified by the specter of his own creation, the gentleman shrieks out that "the integrity of the Constitution is assailed by revolution," and declares he "will fight for it as though it were a Kohinoor of purest water," although rather curiously comparing that "integrity" to a "chip." These are his words:

Victor Hugo said, in his description of the battle of Waterloo, that the struggle of the two armies was like the wrestling of two giants, when a chip under the heel of one might determine the victory. It may be that this amendment is the chip under your heel, or it may be that it is the chip on our shoulder. As a chip, it is of small account to you or to us; but when it represents the integrity of the Constitution and is assailed by revolution, we fight for it as if it were a Kohinoor of purest water.

Now, if the honorable member will only refresh his memory and recall some of the incidents of a not distant past in his own section of country, he must remember how elastic the provisions of the Constitution became in the hands of his friends, and how they trampled on its "integrity," treating it as a dead letter, under the tyrant's plea of State necessity. If he will recall those memories, his present morbid susceptibility should surprise even himself as much as it does his hearers, who cannot forget these things.

Mr. Chairman, it is of record in the courts of Illinois and of the Supreme Court of the United States that in Illinois, as well as in other Northern States, men were arrested and imprisoned without color of law or legal warrant, and that a reign of terror, with its Bastiles full of prisoners—"on suspicion of being suspect," to borrow a phrase from French revolutionary times—was substituted for the Constitution and laws, even where war had never reached. To prove how utterly without warrant or even show of legality these high-handed proceedings were, I need only cite one out of hundreds of cases—that of a brave citizen of Illinois, M. Y. Johnson, who defied these violators of the liberty of speech and person in a State where there was no suspension of the regular courts, yet who was violently seized while in the sacred precincts of the temple of justice itself, dragged away without any warrant, and left to languish many months in the Bastiles into which American forts had been converted for the incarceration of State prisoners, a class unknown to the Constitution or our laws, specially created for the occasion.

Unterrified by imprisonment and persecution, this brave man, conscious that he had violated no law, instituted suit against his captors and the instigators of this persecution, and for nearly seven years after his liberation followed it up through the courts to the Supreme Court, and was finally triumphantly vindicated, and his adversaries (among whom were some of the most prominent political leaders in the Northwest) escaping his just vengeance only after making a most abject apology and confession of wrong-doing in writing, which constitutes part of the records of this remarkable case.

It never has been considered sound doctrine, in the part of the Union from which I come, that the Constitution of the United States was not equally as binding in time of war as in time of peace; and this case offers a curious commentary on the fervent professions of the gentleman from Ohio, as contrasted with the practices of his political friends and neighbors in the Northwest, who have substituted arbitrary powers for the provisions of the Constitution wherever and whenever the opportunity offered.

The Supreme Court, in the case just mentioned, declared in substance:

That the President had no such powers as those exercised in this arrest, and that he and all those acting under his orders were trespassers. That in his military capacity his authority was restricted to the lines of the Army.

That such power as claimed for the President and his subordinates cannot safely be intrusted to any government by a people claiming to be free. Where it is only limited by his discretion it is an absolute despotism and constitutional government merely a theory.

But the gentleman from Ohio does not enjoy a monopoly in his denunciation of democracy as the enemy of the Constitution. We find another extremist in the honorable member from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] whose nightmare is more violent than that of the member from Ohio. In his visions he is haunted by the terrific spectacle of the "capture of the Capitol" by the democracy, who he strives to stamp with disloyalty to the Constitution and the Union. This is his language, and it is strange language indeed, addressed to a majority of a representative body by one of the minority:

Gentlemen, you are standing close by the Capitol, I admit, but not so close as you stood over here in Virginia when your troops were following ours after Bull Run. The Capitol is not in so much danger as it was then, but you are standing dangerously near, and that hand of yours is outstretched now, thank God, not a bloody one. It will never again be a bloody one. You have a better opinion of northern men than you had twenty years ago and you will seek no more blood, but your hand is stretched out now apparently ready to grasp the crown. Gentlemen, the angel of God will touch that hand and it will wither.

On this point I take direct issue with the member from Maine, and deny that he and his party can claim any distinctive right or have taken out any patent privilege to protect and defend the Capitol or enjoy a monopoly of all the patriotism and love of country existing in this Union, stronger now than ever, since its reconstruction and the removal of the only bone of contention that imperiled the harmony of the sections. Why the gentleman is a sleepy watchman, and sounds his alarm too late. The democratic party has for more than four weeks past been in actual occupation and possession of the Capitol, and will so continue certainly until the close of the Forty-sixth Congress, and probably for an indefinite term beyond. Hence the prayer or imprecation with which the member from Maine closes his appeal has been rejected before he uttered it, as the prayers of the wicked usually are.

It is high time that this cant of superior patriotism on the part of men who have done their best or their worst to violate both the letter and the spirit of the Constitution for mere partisan purposes should cease. The democratic party has always proved its devotion to the Constitution and to the Union as constituted by our fathers by deeds as well as words, as its record shows.

Since the war, so far as the South is concerned, let it be said once for all and forever, that having submitted her cause to the high arbitrament of war and failed, the South on re-entering the Union made pledges to which she will be true, and neither now nor hereafter will she revive the question of slavery or of secession from the Union, which that struggle settled forever, yet which, like a troubled ghost, is ever invoked on the opposite side to revive fraternal hate, which should be buried with the war. The northern men who actually came to the defense of the national capital in time of war with other arms than epithets and invective entertain no such sentiments of suspicious rancor, which seem a monopoly of the non-combatants of Maine who rush to the defense of the Capitol when it is in no danger. One might really suppose that the Capitol was the exclusive property of these gentlemen or of their party from the way they talk, instead of being the common property. Before making this pretension it would be well for them to exhibit their title-deeds, for we claim to be here not by sufferance but by right as well as they. Hence this idle talk of protecting the Capitol from the democracy or preventing our capture of it after we are in full possession has a very revolutionary sound. So much for these vague general charges in which assertion is substituted for proofs and epithets for argument.

Let us now touch on a point that comes nearer home to my constituents, who have been held up to the country as ruffians, murderers, and violators of the ballot-box, when in truth they have been the victims of partisan oppression and misrepresentation and of a lawless despotism unparalleled in the history of free government. I can speak with thorough knowledge of the constituency which I represent, having myself been a resident and sufferer in common with them.

The whole field is too vast to be covered here; I shall merely attempt to vindicate that community from the senseless howl which has been raised against it to perpetuate the reign of fraud, perjury, theft, outrage, and lawless violence which constituted radical rule. The general impression has prevailed at the North that since the war three of the parishes which I represent have been the theater of lawless violence, intimidation, and murder for political purposes, and that for this state of things the resident white population were responsible; all of which I solemnly deny and challenge the proofs. I will go further, and deny that the colored population should be held responsible for this state of things, which arose from external influences, and was brought about directly by carpet-bag and radical rule in the State, backed by Federal bayonets.

The world now knows what manner of government Louisiana was long afflicted with, as well as by what manner of men the power was administered, but the world never will know the extent to which the corruption and disregard of common law and common honesty and justice on the part of those men rendered life and property insecure; and what was stigmatized as "outrages" were despairing efforts to defend person and property from the clutch of thieves and assassins, supported, sustained, and countenanced by the central carpet-bag government. These disturbances had chiefly no political significance or complexion, and have also been grossly exaggerated. The true condition of things then existing may be briefly thus described: From the time the government of Louisiana passed into the hands of the carpet-baggers under the reconstruction acts, and through the whole course of that rule, it was impossible to obtain justice in the courts, and more particularly in the administration of the criminal-law jurisdiction. The records of those courts will show that the people subject to this rule were for a long time patient under suffering and remained law-abiding for seven long and dreary years. During the whole of that period corrupt and venal judges, mere political tools, as ignorant of law as of honesty, and often inveterate and beastly drunkards, distributed injustice from the judicial bench, especially on the criminal side of the court. Men were brought up for trial without color of law, fined and imprisoned, or summoned before magistrates (some of whom were drawn from the lowest dregs of the populace, often unable to read or write) whom they were obliged to bribe to obtain liberation. Powers were given to justices of the peace in certain misdemeanors to arrest and examine parties with a view to determine a threatened breach of the peace, and on the most frivolous pretexts men were dragged from their homes and business to answer such charges. Innumerable witnesses would be summoned and the business of the community retarded that the accused party might be heavily mulcted in costs for the benefit of these corrupt officials. This became a common practice, to the infinite annoyance and loss of all the respectable portion of the community.

The administration of the criminal law in the parishes was a reproach and a by-word. Neither person nor property found protection in the courts, while the impunity afforded to crime by this state of affairs gave unbridled license to the thieves and ruffians engendered by it. Landed proprietors of all colors, who had been left by the war in possession of their real estate and live-stock as their only means of living, were at the mercy of these depredators, who almost wiped out the stock by theft of the most barefaced description, often accompanied with violence. After the stock was nearly all stolen and destroyed and the people left to depend alone on their crops for subsistence, exacting the most grinding and perpetual toil throughout the year, when the harvest was rich and ripe for gathering, these thieves would descend upon the fleecy cotton-fields by night like a cloud of locusts and bear away the fruits of the farmers' toil to the nearest cross-roads shop—the receiver of the stolen booty. These shop-keepers belonged to no party, class, or color, and they managed their business so adroitly and were assured of such impunity from the courts that the despoiled people in despair were reduced to the alternative of selling their lands and emigrating, (which many of them did,) or devising some protection for their property outside of the mockery of appealing to the courts for a redress of their grievances.

At last these men, rendered desperate, banded together for mutual protection, and struck when human endurance had been tested to the utmost. Their sole object was self-preservation and for the protection of home and fireside and rights of property against an organized banditti. Their first blow fell on the theivish receivers who were accumulating wealth out of the plunder stolen from the planters. Formal notice was given these men that their illicit traffic in the plundered property of the people must cease, or punishment would be meted out to them. At first, disregarding these warnings and treating them with contempt in consequence of their long impunity, these traders continued their iniquitous traffic; when to their astonishment they were visited at night by bodies of armed men, who, allowing them to remove their money and accounts, burned down the buildings, with all their stolen contents, often of considerable value. The men who were thus visited by this self-constituted tribunal were almost exclusively white men and democrats, so that no political considerations did or could influence the formation of these associations or the action of these avengers. It is not positively known, but generally believed, that white and black men, republicans and democrats, joined in this work of deliverance, and it was generally admitted that the leader was a prominent republican of East Feliciana.

Innocent persons may possibly have suffered through mistake, yet such cases must have been rare indeed in communities where every man is so well known to his neighbors. In one case, in my own parish, a young trader was notified of a visitation, and he, being a brave as well as an innocent and honest man, published a card in the papers after receiving the notice declaring his innocence and intention of defending himself and property. Several days having passed, he was surprised one evening, unarmed, in his shop by a body of armed men confronting him, who gave him an agreeable surprise by informing him that they had examined into his case and, being satisfied of his innocence, did not intend to interfere with him, while at the same time they desired to prove to him that his threats had not deterred them and that he was powerless to resist them.

It required but a few examples to stop effectually the contraband trade and stealing of cotton; and in front of the shops, in town and country, might be seen on large signs, painted conspicuously, "No seed-cotton bought here," the seed-cotton being that stolen from the fields before it was ginned. This stopped the trade; and the Legislature of Louisiana passed a law prohibiting the sale of cotton in the seed after dark, thereby ratifying the justice and need of these acts.

Such, to a great extent, was the origin of the bulldozers, whose name has been made the scare-crow throughout the North and identified with political proscription and intimidation.

But we need not go so far as Louisiana to find examples of such proceedings, nor need we go to the wild West in search of them; for in the decorous and law-abiding East, in the very State which enjoys the privilege of numbering my colleague among its Representatives here, we find a remarkable precedent, where the purpose was purely political and not dictated by self-preservation. If I am correctly informed, (and I have good reasons to believe I am,) shortly after the breaking out of the late war, while the courts were all open in the loyal State of Maine, and amply sufficient to protect every citizen in his rights, a citizen of that State, for simply expressing his sentiments in the exercise of that right of free speech guaranteed by the Constitution, was arrested without warrant of law, dragged from his home, and incarcerated in one of the Bastiles prepared for State prisoners, whence he was finally discharged after months of imprisonment without receiving notice of any charge against him or even the form of a trial. Curiously enough, this gentleman, Robert Elliott by name, was a prominent citizen of Freedom, Maine, and had filled important public offices. This State prisoner's property was twice bulldozed by midnight incendiaries, his barns well filled with hay being twice burned down, and his loss very great. His crime was his profession of democratic principles. His dwelling-house was also burned down through the same agencies, which everybody knew were political. We may thus regard political bulldozing as a Maine institution and Freedom its birth-place.

It has been further stated to me from a reliable source that the property of other democrats in this place being also set fire to by incendiaries and destroyed, a system of reprisals was instituted by which the property of several prominent republicans was destroyed, when finding that this was "a game two could play at," the parties mutually ceased firing, and bulldozing ceased at Freedom, Maine. For if this were not bulldozing, then things as well as names must be different in Maine and Louisiana.

Another and very remarkable demonstration by a people goaded to desperation by the infringement of their rights and liberties is afforded by the glorious strike for the sacred right to keep and bear arms made by the people of New Orleans, 14th September, 1874, in assertion of that right which the Constitution of the United States gives in these words: "The right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed." For the effort to deprive them of this inalienable right was the last straw that broke the camel's back. Our people had endured every shape and form of civil and military tyranny, had peacefully borne wrong, insult, and injury, but when the attempt was made to disarm them and deprive them of that last right which neither the executive, legislative, nor judicial department of government, State or Federal, could wrest from them, they indignantly struck down the bastard government of Kellogg, which disappeared like a foul vapor, to be reinstated only by the military power of the Government. This clash of resounding arms awakened the people of the North and spoke in more eloquent tones than all the reports of all the investigating committees so liberally showered down on Louisiana. It caused them to pause and reflect and to respond with sympathy to the righteous indignation of their own kindred and blood, and struck a chord in their hearts which vibrated through the length and breadth of the land.

Whenever the liberty of the citizen—no matter what his race, color, or condition—is infringed, the true American heart, unwarped by prejudice or party, must beat responsive to resistance. The most remarkable feature of this strike of the 14th of September was that no colored man was interfered with or molested in the city of New Orleans, where they were completely at the mercy of the so-called white league. On the contrary, they were more secure from violence then than they had been under any previous rule.

Standing here as the representative of a very large body of colored voters, I desire to vindicate that class of my constituents from the slanders of their quondam friend, the gentleman from Maine, who, in the last Congress, lamented in set terms the necessity forced upon his party of giving the colored man the ballot, where he made the following unjust reflection on the whole of that class of voters, thus:

> I sometimes wish we had not given it, (the ballot,) because to-day it is only putting increased power into the hands of the South, and none to the negro.

I do not share in this statement. I do not regret the gift which the colored man is showing himself competent to use. The rapid progress which the better class of colored men have made, both in intelligence and in acquisition of property, and their earnest efforts to improve the condition of their children, convince me that they will not abuse the boon that has been made them. And it is a curious fact that, with his improvement, instead of antagonizing with his white neighbors (which he was taught by the carpet-bagger and Freedman's Bureau was his best policy) he is daily drawing closer and nearer in fraternal feeling to his white neighbors and friends, whose interests are identical with his own. The next generation will probably see a yet more solid South than that which alarms northern extremists to-day. For just so long as the policy of repression and hatred and distrust of the South continues to be the evangel of radical agitators, just so long will unity and peace and brotherly concord between the sections delay their visit to this too long distracted country.

The great heart of the American people now beats for peace. The public mind, wearied of perpetual agitation on pretexts as false as they are frivolous, longs for rest, for a return of fraternal feeling and an end of partisan rancor and strife. The democratic party, North or South, is not responsible for the continuance of this agitation. Its first act on attaining power has been to stanch the bleeding wounds of the country and to restore an era of good feeling by the repeal of vicious legislation enacted for mere partisan purposes, so as to restore the Constitution to its purity and leave the people of the whole country untrammeled in the exercise of that great right which lies at the foundations of our free institutions. That great right once secured by the legislation we are now striving to effect against a factious opposition, we can address ourselves to other measures of relief which will unfetter the hands of labor, manacled by the narrow and unwise legislation of the party whose power is now passing away—a party which has ever consulted the interests of a few monopolists at the expense of the great working masses of our people, whom they have caused to writhe under a restrictive legislation, concentrating wealth and power in the hands of the few to the impoverishment of the many.

When we have effected these things, then, and not until then, shall we, the triumphant democracy, be able to boast that our new republic, after its baptism of blood and tears, has really become what our fathers sought to make it—

Great, glorious, and free,
A model for all the nations.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I shall preface what I have to say on this occasion and this subject by reference to a proviso attached to an appropriation bill to prevent the payment of the fund to the territorial officials in Kansas until certain conditions were complied with. While said proviso was under consideration in the first session of the Thirty-fourth Congress Hon. John Sherman, now the republican Secretary of the Treasury, said:

It does seem to me that gentlemen on all sides of the House should accept this for the peace and harmony of the country. If the Senate will not yield this much, then, sir, let us stop the supplies.

I presume, sir, that John Sherman is about as good authority as the expounder of the doctrines and principles of the republican party of to-day as St. Paul was of the doctrines of the Christian religion in his day, but what a wonderful change has taken place; what was once orthodox and catholic with that party is now denounced as unsound and dangerous.

Sir, the country is not prepared for the struggle that has been and is now going on between the two contending parties in this Congress for the repeal of this statute so obnoxious and detestable in the eyes of all unprejudiced, liberty-loving people. It was hoped and believed that after years of peace, reconciliation, and harmony, both sections and all parties would cordially unite in one grand and noble effort to expunge from the statute-books every law passed in times of great political commotion and found by experience to be unwise and in derogation of the rights and liberties of the American citizen.

But unfortunately for the prosperity and happiness of our land and the independence and freedom of its subjects we have become accustomed to and familiar with military life and military rule until we have ceased to regard the usurpation of political and military power with feelings of indignation and the infringement of our dearest rights with contempt. Thirty years ago he who would have been so bold and daring as to have suggested the law we are now attempting to repeal would have been driven from public service, disgraced, and denounced as a tyrant and usurper. But to-day we have men on this floor, able and eloquent, from whom the country expected better things, advocating a doctrine which would have damned them politically less than twenty years ago—a doctrine which has neither been claimed nor exercised by any crowned head of England in more than a hundred years, not even in her dark and bloody days when Jeffries became a willing and corrupt tool in the hands of his wicked master.

If the right of Federal interference in State elections should become crystallized and incorporated in our organic law we can no longer boast of our free institutions and republican form of government, but will have demonstrated to the eyes of all the world what has been so often said by kings, emperors, and monarchs, that a republic was an empty sound, a Utopian dream of blinded fanatics.

The aristocracy and nobility of England, not even the lords themselves, who were born, cradled, and reared under arbitrary power, and whose personal aggrandizement would have led to the concentration of power in their own household, and especially in the hands of their chief rulers, have not for nearly a century advocated such a fearful and dangerous doctrine. The experience of the whole civilized world has long since demonstrated that power cannot with safety to the subject be trusted in the hands of one man and his privy council. Thus we see that England, predisposed to the absorption of civil and political powers by custom and education, has reserved to her subjects the privilege to elect their House of Commons without let or hinderance from the Crown. But here in America, where the goddess of liberty stands with her burnished sword uplifted ready to strike down the tyrant who would dare usurp her throne, we find those who heretofore claimed to be the champions of the inalienable rights of the people, attempting in noonday light, with an assassin's hand, to stab her to death.

I am aware that some of the ablest commentators on the Constitution and the laws claim that the Federal head has the ultimate right under the Constitution to superintend the elections in the States for members of Congress. But neither the supreme courts of the States nor the Supreme Court of the United States, the highest tribunal and last resort, have ever given such a construction or interpretation to that instrument. The clause we are now attempting to repeal is in contravention and open violation of both the letter and spirit of the Constitution and should be wiped from the statutes at the earliest possible opportunity by the united efforts of both political parties.

Sir, this contest here in this Hall is but the forerunner of that conflict that must sooner or later take place between the toiling millions and the combined moneyed power of this country. Let no man call me a leveler. I am as far from it as the east is from the west. I would give to capital the fullest and freest latitude in its legitimate sphere, in leveling down the mountains, in rifling the bowels of the earth, in covering the seas with floating cities, and in developing all the material interests of this grand and noble country. But I would place labor on the same high and grand level; they should march hand in hand, side by side to the loftiest watch-towers of human genius, human effort, and human development.

No people, sir, ever lost their freedom suddenly and unexpectedly from causes within their own dominion, but by degrees almost imperceptible they are educated in the school of servile submission, relinquishing one and then another right, until finally, under pretended and assumed constitutional and legal forms, the tyrant, while the people are lulled to sleep in their imagined security, seizes the iron scepter, and with an iron heel stamps the Constitution under foot and waves his sword over a nation reduced to slavery. We have already witnessed in this capital of the nation the soldier, the bayonet, and the cannon at the count of the electoral vote and the inauguration of a President. May such a scene never again be presented to the American people. The legislation in question is a foul blot upon our reputation and a damning disgrace to American civilization. Could the originators and framers of our system of government have anticipated and foreseen the encroachments upon the Constitution, the infringements upon the inherent and reserved rights of the people, and the enormous and despotic power placed in the hands of an irresponsible marshal and an unprincipled partisan supervisor of election, they would have recoiled from the plan conceived, bowed their heads in shame and grief, and confessed that man was utterly incapable of self-government.

Such power and authority has never been claimed and exercised in any civilized country since the Cromwellian period, until America gave birth to a republican party and a spirit of military predominance and civil subordination. Think of it: an insignificant partisan subordinate, whose only desire is to do his master's will, clothed with supreme power to call to his aid the whole posse comitatus including the Army, upon his own motion, without information, affidavit, or warrant in arresting and incarcerating his fellow-citizen, because, forsooth, in his wicked and distempered imagination he anticipates some one will be intimidated and not allowed to vote the republican ticket in a republican State under republican laws! No commander of an army, or governor, or president in this country ever possessed such supreme and destructive power as these supervisors and marshals.

I would like for some gentleman on the other side of the Hall to divest himself of passion and party prejudice, and put on the pure robe of disinterested patriotism, and tell me, if the right to appoint their agents by a free ballot was not reserved to the people in their grant or delegation of powers to the General Government, what right or rights were reserved? The great fundamental principle, the foundation-stone upon which the whole superstructure of our grand and sublime system of human government has been reared, has been contemptuously ignored and rejected by the republican side of this Chamber. How did your Federal Union originate? What power created and gave to it substance, form, and life? Was it not created of the delegated powers by the States? Is it not the creature and the States the creators; and is it not impossible for it to possess or exercise any powers other than those delegated or surrendered by the States in the adoption of the Federal Constitution? Without the States the Federal Union could never have existed. Strike down the blood-bought and God-given freedom of the States and you at the same time and with the same stroke blot out the Federal Union and substitute in its stead a consolidated despotism.

The Federal Government cannot exist one moment under the Constitution without the pre-existence and coexistence of the States clothed with all their original reserved right. I would not be misunderstood; when a State has once surrendered a part or all of its rights to the General Government it can never under any circumstances, legally and constitutionally, resume them, and any attempt to recover the powers once surrendered would be revolution in its broadest and most comprehensive meaning. And, on the other hand, any effort on the part of the Federal Government to exercise powers not surrendered, not granted, not delegated in the Federal Constitution, would be a usurpation which if not checked in its inception would lead ultimately to the final overthrow and destruction of our system of government. Self-preservation is the first law of nature, and it would have been more than folly in our forefathers to have formed and cemented a union with their affections, tears, and blood without sufficient self-sustaining power to preserve its own life, and by a legitimate and constitutional employment of this power, through the appointed channels, it draws its nourishment and life-blood from every artery and fountain of the States; and to this no intelligent, honest man objects, but rather rejoices that the genius, wisdom, experience, and patriotism of the grand old heroes and statesmen of '76 discovered and established such an inexhaustible reservoir from which the Federal Union could obtain supplies and become perpetual.

But upon the other hand it would be a stultification of the intellect, in opposition to all reason and theory and an imputation upon the honesty, integrity, and patriotism of the orginators and framers of the Constitution to suppose that they intended to give or did give to the Federal Union in the Constitution power sufficient to absorb all the functions of the States, to override the State constitutions not in conflict with its own, and to crush out and trample under foot the nearest and dearest rights of the citizens which the States were so careful and so anxious in reserving to themselves when they entered into the Federal Union. This Congress has by the Constitution, article 1, section 8, power to levy duties, provide for the defense of the United States, to regulate commerce, to coin money, &c. These are subjects the supreme control of which was surrendered to the General Government, and the States are forever estopped from claiming any control whatever over them; and any attempt to do so would be revolutionary and in violation of the original compact, and the courts, both Federal and State, would so declare. But those subjects and powers the control of which has not been surrendered or delegated to the Federal Government are as fully, completely, and as absolutely under the control and direction of the States as they were before the Federal Union was created; and any attempt whatever on the part of Congress or the President or the Federal judiciary, or any of their appointees or subalterns, to control or interfere with the same is in gross violation both of the letter and spirit of article 10 of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States respectively or to the people.

Mr. Chairman, so long as any State has a republican form of government, and her constitution and laws are not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and no invading foe treads her sacred soil, and so long as no United States law is violated, just so long is it the constitutional, legal, and moral duty of the President, of Congress, of the Federal courts and their marshals to refrain from any interference whatever in the execution or the non-execution of the State laws. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided, in Minor vs. Happersett, 21 Wall., 178, "that the Constitution of the United States has not conferred the right of suffrage upon any one, and that the United States have no voters of their own creation in the States." So the right of suffrage is derived from the State constitution and laws, and must of necessity and from the very nature of our system of government be under the influence and control of State authority.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I must be allowed to express my condemnation of the conduct of those gentlemen upon the other side of the Hall who have made it convenient to search the dusty records for half a century back, and charged upon the South all the sins of the nation both of omission and commission.

We are defiantly told that a solid South will make a solid North, and with this flimsy reasoning it is expected to unite the North against the South in 1880, and drive the colored man back into the republican ranks. But this game has been played just one time too many. The good people of the North will not again be deceived and misled at the flaunting of your bloody shirt, nor will the honest, decent, colored man give a listening ear to your false wooings. At Appomattox we grounded our arms and furled our worn and tattered flag which had never been lowered in the dust or trailed in disgrace, and at the bottom of your hearts and in the secret fountains of your souls you could but admire the courage that unfurled it and the courage that surrendered it. Had your course then toward the South been that of a brave, chivalrous, magnanimous conqueror, scorning with indignation to take the advantage of a brave though fallen foe whose arms had been laid at your feet, you would have captured and gathered around your political standard a large and gallant band of southern soldiers. Instead of adopting that policy, passion inflamed by prejudice dethroned reason, and you, apparently to gratify your ambition and to further punish and humiliate the South, adopted a policy more ignominious, damnable, and inhuman than could have been justified against the red man of the West.

We had staked all on the result of the war, and had lost all save honor. The distance from the cradle to the grave had been carefully scanned and culled for soldiers. Our means and energy had been completely exhausted in the terrible conflict; our fields had been devastated and ruined; and all we had save our honor, virtue, and manhood had been swept away as with a besom of destruction, and a threatening cloud, blacker than midnight, hung like a pall of death over the whole South. Society had been convulsed, and its upheaval had turned things upside down and inside out. Four millions of colored people, who had been obedient and faithful slaves, shrouded in ignorance and superstition, whose emancipation had been almost as sudden as Paul's conversion, were without homes, without shelter, without bread, and five millions of white people were even in a more deplorable condition if possible, save their intelligence and experience. While in this earthly pandemonium, the heart of both black and white aching and longing for relief, the colored man, in the simplicity of his nature and the gratitude of his soul, was educated by northern emissaries and political blood-suckers to suspect and hate not only the democrat, who had been his master, but the word democracy itself.

In this unfortunate state of affairs, with the disfranchisement of a large number of our ablest and most experienced statesmen, these bad men were enabled to control the colored vote and gain a complete possession of the State governments. The result is a matter of history and need not be gone into by me in my limited time. But finally the day-star of our salvation began slowly but surely to make its appearance, and in the north and west faint gleams of light were discerned by the patriot darting across the political horizon. That same orb that emitted the first beams of light continued to rise higher and higher and to shine brighter and brighter until our whole country, both North and South, has felt the beneficent influence of its glorious rays, and ere two years shall get behind us she will mount to the zenith of her glory in her noon-day splendor, and no false cry of treason, traitor, rebel, revolution, and conspiracy can cover up its light. Mr. Chairman, if the confederate soldier on this floor were to join the republican party to-day he would be purged with lightning speed of all revolution, treason, and conspiracy; yes, purified, sanctified, and glorified like Mosby, Longstreet, and others. Sir, it seems the crime is not that he attempted to shoot the Government out of existence. Oh, no, that is a small matter, provided he is a fawning sycophant at the republican shrine.
